TOLERATION IS A CRIME.

And 'Tis Blasphemy to Advocate It, According to the Blue Law and Puritan Idea.

BY THEODORE SCHROEDER.

[The pioneer Secularist in America was Roger Williams, whom the Puritans of Massachusetts banished to the wilderness because he denied the function of the civil government to punish for infractions of religious ordinances. Then as now the dissenters from orthodoxy who voiced their protest were accused of breaking the peace. The very thing we observe in our own day—that the disturbance uniformly arises, not from the writer or speaker, but from those who would forcibly suppress him—was noted by Roger Williams, who pointed out that the persecution of people for their religion was itself the first "breach of civility." This discourse on "ROGER WILLIAMS AND FREE SPEECH" occurs in the course of the argument in preparation for use in the Connecticut blasphemy case, now pending.]

THOSE who desire adequately to understand the meaning of our constitutional guarantees of free speech must first understand both the English and American controversies which brought about the existence of those guarantees. When we acquire a clear view of the precise issues involved between different conceptions of tolerance, as these were debated in the prerevolutionary period, then only can we acquire an intelligent appreciation of the better meaning of the language of our constitutions.

In England the slowly changing attitude toward tolerance may be said to date from Milton's immortal "Areopagitica," published in 1644. The Star Chamber court was abolished in 1641. During its existence a youth named Roger Williams took shorthand notes of the speeches and proceedings. Thus, doubtless, he learned something of what does not constitute liberty. He probably studied law with Sir Edward Coke, but abandoned that calling for the ministry. He left for America December, 1630, and settled in Massachusetts.

The founders of the Connecticut colonies came from Massachusetts and brought with them all the theocratic notions of the dominant Puritan faction. Roger Williams had been under their suspicion for some time for his too great liberality. In 1636 he was banished from Massachusetts by a court which had already decided that "anyone was worthy of banishment who should obstinately assert that the civil magistrate might not intermeddle, even to stop a church from apostasy and heresy."

Thus the mere advocacy of tolerance was penalized.

Beginning of the Secular State.

The colony of which Williams was the founder was built upon an entirely different theory of government from any that had previously obtained in America or Europe. He was of the Puritan minority. Here we find the first declaration of a democracy, and the beginnings of a secular state devoted to toleration in a new sense. America and the whole world have profited by the practical application of Williams's theory to the affairs of government. We must understand Roger Williams's conception of tolerance if we would understand the meaning of constitutional freedom of speech and press.

The colony at Providence undertook to define and defend human liberty in matters of religion, instead of that "liberty of the gospel" by which others sought to dominate in temporal affairs. Roger Williams and his followers were for the protection of intellectual freedom, and in 1637 went so far as to disfranchise a man for refusing liberty of conscience to his wife (Bloody Tenet of Persecution, p. 28; also Records of the Colony of Rhode Island, p. 16), in not permitting her to go to meeting as often as she desired.

During the following years there raged a considerable controversy over the subject of free speech in matters of religion. In this controversy Williams published a number of tracts in criticism of the intolerance of his Massachusetts neighbors and in defense of his own position against the attacks of the Massachusetts divines. The collection of Williams's tracts has been republished under the title of "The Bloody Tenet of Persecution." I am quoting from the London edition of 1848. Here we find the beginning of the free speech controversy in Rhode Island, in Connecticut and in the United States. For over a century this controversy raged between theocracy and democracy, and between free speech and blasphemy laws. By the time the American constitutions were formed, these ideas of Roger Williams had secured the ascendancy over the idea of the majority among the earlier Massachusetts and Connecticut colonists. Under the leadership of Jefferson and the Virginia Act of Toleration (Reynolds v. U. S. 98 U. S. 163; Peop. v. Croswell, 3 John. Cases 393), our American constitutions recorded the people's verdict in favor of the contentions of Roger Williams for a separation of church and state, and in favor of free speech for all controversies over religion. To understand the significance of that new constitutional policy of freedom of discussion, we must compare the idea of the early Connecticut colonists, already recorded, with those later and contrary ideas which found expression in the constitutions of Connecticut and of the United States. Furthermore, to get the true meaning of these provisions we must look to the ideas of men like Roger Williams and Thomas Jefferson, who demanded such provisions, and not to the opponents of freedom.

Truth vs. Peace.

In one discourse Williams personified the two sets of ideas under the form of a dialogue between Peace and Truth. These words really symbolized the conflict quite perfectly. The friends of censorship and repression always make their justification to depend upon the importance of immediate and transient peace-requirements. In the interests of this immediate peace they are willing to suppress irritating claims of truth, and to ignore the more remote and less apparent advantages of intellectual freedom.

The friends of free speech always place the emphasis upon the relatively greater importance to be attached to claims of truth. In consequence of this different valuation, the friends of truth say that for its sake we must take some chances on disturbing the immediate peace, but we believe that in the long run peace will be more lasting, because more intelligently conditioned, where all claims of truth are given full freedom to be heard.

The early Connecticut colonies had the absolute and only divine truth, and wanted only "the liberty of the gospel." Therefore, in a conflict between mere heretical claims of truth and their own absolute truth and peace of mind, they always decided in favor of the latter. The Rhode Island colonies were perhaps equally certain that they possessed the absolute truth, but disagreed with their neighbors as to methods of propagating truth. They placed emphasis on free speech for all, as the very best means of establishing truth more perfectly in the minds of men. The Connecticut and Massachusetts colonists placed their confidence in the efficacy of forceful suppression of "error." A more modern conception is that all claims of truth should be tolerated because none of us has the absolute truth; because all "truth" is but a partial and incomplete aspect of the absolute truth and a purely personal concept.

In order to make clear the conflict between the ideas of tolerance entertained by Roger Williams, and embodied in the Connecticut constitution, and those entertained by the earlier colonist as embodied in the blasphemy statute of 1642, it becomes necessary to give a more thorough portrayal of Williams's contention, even at the risk of becoming tiresome.

The Prosecution Is Breach of the Peace.

When Williams was told that he erred in defending the rights of those who expressed themselves with such "arrogance and impetuosity as of itself tended to the disturbance of the peace," he drew the line between spiritual peace and civil peace. He pointed out how a company of men might "hold disputations, and in matters concerning their society may dissect, divide, break into schism and factions, sue and implead each other at the law, wholly break up and dissolve into pieces and nothing, and yet the peace of the city not be in the least measure impaired or disturbed." Citing other illustrations, he concludes: "And notwithstanding those spiritual oppositions in point of worship and religion, yet hear we not of the least noise, nor need we, if men keep but the bond of civility, of any civil breach, or breach of civil peace among them, and to persecute God's people then for religion, that only was a breach of civility itself."

He classifies his opponents with satanic accusers in these words: "Which charge [that dissenters are arrogant and impetuous], together with that of obstinacy, pertinacity, pride, troublers of the City, etc., Satan commonly loads the meekest of the saints and witnesses of Jesus with" (p. 49). This he justifies by reference to the Bible. Thus he makes plain that he does not intend to heed the cry of fear of disturbing the peace, which is too easy a pretense in the hands of persecutors.

This "Dialogue Between Truth and Peace" of course contradicted the theory of the English common law as to blasphemy and so contradicted the official conception of the Christian religion. It was seditious, very seditious, and blasphemous also, because no proper interpretation of Holy Writ could warrant such toleration as it advocated. Therefore the circulation of this book was a crime. Furthermore the very advocacy of tolerance tended necessarily to encourage the enemies of government to believe in their right to express their treasonable sentiments. What more logical, then, than that a government which does not believe in free speech and does believe in suppressing books for their evil psychologic possibilities, should order Roger Williams's plea for toleration burned by the common hangman? This was actually done by the House of Commons. (See Journals of the House of Commons, vol. 3, 20 Car. I, p. 585.)

Williams's prime contention was that the civil powers should have no authority whatever over the consciences of men. The corollary of this opinion was that the Church of England (and its government) was anti-Christian—of course from the viewpoint of Williams's interpretation of Christianity. (Dict. of Nat. Biog., vol. 61, p. 445). Prynne denounced the book as a "lycentious book." If now we are to interpret the statutory words "blasphemy" and the "Christian religion" according to this English precedent, and according to the very evident aversion to free speech that is exhibited by the early Connecticut colonists, then Roger Williams's argument for toleration is still a violation of the law.

Perhaps even this present argument is a blasphemy under the statute of 1642. For we are contending for that tolerance of Agnosticism, Deism and Atheism which orthodox Christians agree has a tendency to destroy all that is fundamental in a united Church and State. If evil psychologic tendencies, speculatively ascertained, determine guilt, then every academic argument for freedom would be held criminal by a court and jury who emotionally and intellectually were opposed to freedom. Is not the tendency of every argument for religious toleration a more or less direct incitement to the commission of blasphemy? Indeed the upholding of blasphemers is necessarily itself a form of blasphemy. Thus the idea that psychologic tendencies are to be penalized, logically and unavoidably requires us to penalize all those who contradict holy writ by any demand for tolerance.

If, however, the constitution of Connecticut was designed to preclude that, then it must be interpreted according to the views of tolerance advocated by Roger Williams. From that viewpoint no man can be punished upon the basis of a mere speculative existence of an evil psychologic tendency of his idea. Then we shall also conclude that the Connecticut statute upon blasphemy has been annulled and Mockus must be discharged.

A Connecticut Confirmation.

Simon Backus must not be mistaken for the Rev. Isaac Backus. The latter stood for religious liberty in every form. The former (Simon) was one of the pronounced opponents of separation of church and state as well as of free speech, and in 1804 wrote a pamphlet defending his views. In it he said: "To say, therefore, that there is no occasion for the civil magistrate to interfere in matters of religion, is either to contradict plain and demonstrative fact [as he had just before shown from holy writ], or else to charge the divine author of that dispensation with adding the sanction of his approbation and the seal of his authority to a useless and unnecessary institution." (A Dissertation upon the Right and Obligation of the Civil Magistrate to take care of the Interests of Religion and provide for its Support, p. 15.)

Under this interpretation of Holy Writ, which was in harmony with and in defense of the old Connecticut régime, every argument for a separation of church and state and for tolerance in religion was a denial of part of the Holy Scriptures. Under the common law, interpreted with Connecticut theology, it must be blasphemy; and this very argument now being made must be held to be a crime, if this statute of 1642 is held to be constitutional.

The objection that union of church and state is an infringement of personal liberty, Simon Backus answers by saying: "This objection proves too much, viz., that God did authorize the Jewish magistrate to do that which was an infringement of the just rights and liberty of conscience, and manifested his approbation for so doing. That is, that the God of truth and righteousness, with whom it is impossible to do anything but what is perfectly just and right, did approve of that which is in its own nature unjust, and repugnant to the eternal rule of rectitude, or to the moral law."

Thus to asperse the justice of God is just as es-entially blasphemy as to argue that he is a liar because of real or supposed contradictions found in Holy Writ. To uphold this blasphemy statute of 1642, therefore, means that this court must punish as blasphemy all such arguments for tolerance as have been made by those who have heretofore advocated tolerance, or who now assert the unconstitutionality of the blasphemy statute. All punishments for blasphemy are based upon Holy Writ. All denial of their justice or their morality is an aspersion upon divine justice, not to be tolerated in a "Christian Commonwealth."

That all arguments in favor of tolerance are blasphemous has American precedent, antedating the action of the House of Commons. Let us be again reminded of the action of the Massachusetts colonists, also in the case of Roger Williams; that "any one was worthy of banishment, who should obstinately assert that the civil magistrate might not intermeddle, even to stop a church from apostasy and heresy." (Bloody Tenet of Persecution, p. 15.)

Rationalism—Its Meaning.

This word is defined as a system which makes reason the supreme arbiter in all matters connected with the Bible and the Christian religion, and which refuses to accept any doctrine or historical statement that reason rejects.

We now have a correct idea of Rationalism and what its work is when it gets into action. It is to destroy, root and branch, Bible superstitions, and to put Christianity out of business as a divine institution with its man-god, fictitious heaven, fanciful hell, and all the demons, devils, ghosts and angels that are made to play their various parts in the origin of sin and the scheme of salvation.

Any man with brains enough to seek shelter when it rains, can find freedom from Bible superstitions through Rationalism, if he will only use it as an aid to thinking, for it makes these follies so clear and transparent that common sense refuses longer to accept them.

But it might be said that common sense never did accept them, for through unrestrained credulity alone do they find entrance to the human mind. Reason instantly detects their falsity and absurdities, for they are too raw and glaring to pass the portals; but let us not forget that Bible devotees and Christian believers do not reason, their speciality is seen in receiving all things by faith. They are taught to question nothing, but to accept the whole business with childlike credulity, such as one sees when a mother imparts information to the infant at her knee.

I say they do not reason, which is not wholly correct, for with reason applied to baseless assumptions instead of solid facts, one can reason himself into delusions and errors just as readily as rational thinking when confined to actual realities and demonstrated facts will take him out of such a mental state. When the fundamental follies of Christianity are received as facts without doubt or question, they give a working basis for reasoning that can and will lead one far astray; for reason works with mathematical accuracy on whatever it is applied to; so that if debased by use on imaginary products of the mind, instead of well-known and indisputable facts, one can be led to hold onto unmitigated nonsense as well as living truth.

It all depends on how you start. If you start wrong you go wrong, and that is what every man does who accepts a belief in any kind or form of superstition; and the starting point with all kinds is the same—blind faith.

The Christian never uses reason until he has started on the wrong road, when, of course, he can convince himself by argument that he must be right. To illustrate: if there is an omniscient God, omnipotent in power, who made the world out of nothing and had a large supply left over, as Ingersoll said, then John Calvin's predestination idea is absolutely correct, for such a God must have known and seen every future event to the end of time, which by the way has no end; and the lost and damned souls destined to sizzle and roast in hell forever and afterwards, were known and fated to do so from the beginning. I had a grandfather who accepted this horrible belief, and as long as he lived he never knew peace of mind or absence of fear, for there was no way to find out whether he was one of the elect or one of the damned; and though he prayed with loud voice and great earnestness to be saved from eternal torture and agony, he simply wasted his wind, for as God had decreed who was to be saved and who was to be lost, he turned a deaf ear to all supplications and made no change in his program.

And right here let us reflect on this fact: under his doctrine of foreordination John Calvin himself knew no more than my fool ancestor whether he was to be roasted in hell, or feasted in heaven, where the music of harps and songs is to make the abode of the blest like unto a cabaret restaurant forever and ever, as the Bible expresses it. But here is where John made his great and fundamental mistake, which has produced so much fear and misery in the world, and which Rationalism is trying to exterminate, with Billy Sunday as a determined opponent: John did not find out whether such a God as he believed in had a real or an imaginary existence; he received him through blind faith in the Bible and its declarations. Hence all his clear and much-lauded logic is of no more importance than the ravings of a madman—which he surely was, for nowhere in this boundless universe does such a God exist as he believed in; and no trace or evidence of such a mighty monster can be found outside the Holy Scriptures, the product of priestcraft to bamboozle ignorant and credulous mortals.

Here we see the utter folly of letting another man do our thinking—of putting trust and confidence in any human being who deals in religious absurdities and poses as authority in theological claims which do not, and never did, have one solid fact on which to rest. John Calvin has been responsible for more mental misery and mind agony in this world than any other one man that ever influenced human thought. His conception of the Christian religion was the most fiendish and damnable of any brand among the varied assortments that have sprung up like mushrooms since Martin Luther drove the wedge that split the mother church wide open, and multiplied the follies taught in the name of Christianity; for sub-division of sects is still going on with no end in sight. John Calvin taught, and simple, credulous minds have believed him without the presence of one disturbing doubt to give relief to fear and terror which he inspired; and it is less than twenty-five years since his deluded followers rejected the idea, put forth in declarations of belief termed faith, that all unbaptized infants went direct to hell and never got out. But Ingersoll, the greatest exponent of Rationalism the world has yet seen, made the hierarchy of that mental despotism, through shame and ridicule, take all those little innocents out of hell and stop putting them in there, if changing profession of faith has that power. The agony of mothers so foolish as to believe such stuff in my boyhood days was at times sufficient to dethrone reason, for the thought haunted them day and night where, from any cause, baptism had not been given their dead babies. Such hellish atrocities were then a tenet of Christianity, whose message to mankind has been attractively labeled "tidings of great joy." Only to fiends in hell could it ever be so considered, for above all the religious ever produced by plotting priests to pervert the human mind and produce mental slavery, Christianity towers as the abiding place of cruelty and injustice; of rank folly and downright absurdities. This old hag of superstition still lives and flourishes because people are too lazy or too stupid to think clearly.

All orthodox churches, though many of them shun hell as a Sunday topic, and play upon the love of Jesus for all mankind, are still doing business with the same old hell, without which Christianity would be like a wagon trying to do service on three wheels. God and the devil, hell and heaven, are a quartette that must be united to insure successful operation of its mental machinery. Home without a mother would be no comparison for a Christian without his hell; and while vinegar is a poor thing to catch flies with, hell is the real factor in making Christians.

Fear is the force that does the business. It drives instead of drawing, and it not only puts the mentally bum on Billy Sunday's sawdust trail, but the more advanced intellectually, when obsessed with timidity and terror: in fact, to work a successful revival in a church, a public hall, or at a camp-meeting, without hell, would be as impossible as grand opera without music. Any close observer of Sunday's critics in orthodox churches knows that none of them see anything wrong in his effective use of hell, except the crude and coarse expressions he uses in putting his victims into it, which should be done in a more gentlemanly way so as not to shock those refined and sensitive people, who, when they write the word "hell" use the letter h and a dash.

We have some mollicoddle Rationalists who keep saying: "Don't let us look for the bad; let us try to see the good in all things; but if there is any good in a religious superstition that starts with a pack of lies to produce fear and ends in the same way, you will have to find it with something else than Rationalism, which demands the truth at all times as a guide for thought and action."

The man who lies on the subject of religion is no better than the man who lies on a real estate deal or in selling merchandise, and when he begins with a whopper, any one that follows him further deserves to be made a fool of, as he invariably is.

A mythical Jesus is used to save souls from the wrath of an imaginary God, who, the Bible says, blows fire and smoke through his nostrils—a most peculiar way to reveal “love,” which so many think he is, because some faker in the New Testament so declares in spite of his record in the Old Testament. Rationalism does away with the need of a savior; since no man was ever lost because a mythical Adam ate a mythical apple or for any other reason. We all enter this world in a natural manner and depart the same; and while here we live as Nature, the Supreme Power of the universe, compels us to.

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

The Evangelical Showman in Boston.

Evangelist Sunday continually harps about the cross, belief in Christ, acceptance of the Bible as the only possible means of escaping hell; and yet how little knowledge he has of the so-called savior, as he has been pictured by various writers. That splendid book by Arthur Drews, “The Christ Myth,” means to Sunday only evil. Sunday’s Christ is simply a creation of his mind and purely fictitious. The man who can separate in Christ what belongs to myth and what belongs to real history must be wise and well read.

One writer says: “If such a man as Jesus really lived, then his biographers have given us a caricature of him.”

Sunday spoke by invitation at the Boston Congregational Club, and said among other things: “Now I am here, I want to tell you that I don’t know beans about what is called modern evangelism. My evangelism is as old as the cross of Christ, and any evangelism that don’t hang on the cross don’t mean anything for me. I don’t know anything about your new stuff—your high-brow stuff. . . . The world to-day is crucifying the fundamentals of Christianity, and about the only thing that is orthodox in a good many churches is the name over the door. And the fellow standing in the pulpit is crucifying Christianity. I have been up against a few things in this world, even though I don’t perhaps have as much book learning as some of you. I view things from an angle which entitles me to speak with authority you don’t possess.”

Indeed! Sunday’s conceit crowds out all rational thought from his mind. To those who cannot see things as he does in regard to his mission and authority he says: “But you must have eyes in the back of your heads if you cannot see God’s spirit moving on Boston as he never moved here before.”

If Sunday thinks he is saying a complimentary thing for God, he is grossly mistaken. He also says: “I am calling Presbyterians back to the Westminster Confession, and Congregationalists back to that confession which is as old as the hills of New England.”

Sunday’s coarseness is bad enough, but not half so bad as his hopeless hell, where he says all of us will go who do not cling to Christ. If Sunday had his way and the power, orthodoxy would mean a return of the persecutions of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

The Rev. Charles W. Casson, minister of the Roslindale Unitarian church, said in speaking of Sunday: “It is a sad spectacle to see hundreds of ministers herded in a corner, grinning dumbly at the taunts flung at their impotence. They have sold out to their Raymond of religious bankruptcy, having failed to make good their own stand.”

Again: “Jesus was brave enough to denounce men to their faces, but Sunday, after applying every dirty term in his vocabulary of abuse to Unitarians in cities where no defense could be made, is silent in the city of their friends.”

Sunday claims to uphold Jesus in every way, “but he has publicly affirmed his belief in the Mosaic principles that Jesus repudiated, and scoffed at the higher law of Christianity.”

Sunday’s apparent success has no real depth. It is founded on sensationalism, fear, and ignorance as to the real facts of morality and purity.

The Rev. Mr. Casson says: “It is an organization of a big business. Everything is for display. His God is as unreal as his devil.”

It has been stated that in Philadelphia less than 20 per cent. of the trail hitters belonged to the unsaved class. False names and addresses were given to shield the real identity of many of the persons.

Evangelist Sunday has sent many of the best men that ever lived to hell because of their want of faith; Darwin, Herbert Spencer, Paine, Ingersoll are there. Hell becomes attractive when we consider its inhabitants. Ingersoll wisely said in speaking of heaven. “I want no heaven for which I must give up my own reason; no happiness in exchange for liberty, and no immortality that demands surrender of individuality.”

We do not need to worry about a hell, but I firmly believe if we live after shuffling off the mortal coil, Billy Sunday will see sooner or later what a fool he made of himself while on earth.

Sunday said while in Boston, “Of course, I have cut out slang since coming here,” and at the Ministers’ meeting he put restrictions on his address, but his other addresses bore the old stamp. I cannot say whether Sunday was using a bit of sarcasm when he spoke of dispensing with slang, but it has this look. Of course, the “Higher Criticism” which has such a vital hold on the real intellect of the twentieth century only meets with bitter antagonism from the mouth of Sunday. He says: “When a highbrow comes to me and asks, ‘Are you not aware that the latest scholarship says,’ so and so? I reply, ‘When the word of God says one thing, and scholarship says another, scholarship can go to hell.’ Do you think I’m going to follow the theories of some old mutt, who got them over a pipe of tobacco and a mug of beer at Leipzig or Heidelberg?”

He says in regard to revivals: “I plead not for the modern revival, I plead only for a Pentecostal revival that will send drunkards home sober, and make thieves steal no more; make a man kiss his wife instead of cussing her; that will burn up the pride and fear of man, and make out of this sin-cursed world a blessing.”

Here are good sentiments, but does Sunday really do half as much to give them life as moderate moral teachers? I fail to see that he does.

His religious sentiments are founded on a hopeless hell, fear, and a God who punishes eternally. No regenerative process, according to him, is at work in the next world. Such theories will not make man purer. “Modernism” is about as foreign to him, as an expression of truth, as it has been to the last two Catholic popes. The only difference seems to be that Sunday bases his theory on the Bible and the pope on the teachings of the Romish church.

Sunday confesses his ignorance of modern evangelism, and quotes a remark he heard criticizing it, to wit: “A revival is not objectionable, but well, it is an abnormal condition.” His reply was: “I say, you lie.”

He gives a fling at Sunday schools, and says: “The Sunday school ought to be a constant feeder into the church. Why can’t it? Because we have Sunday school teachers who are absolutely good for nothing; they help nobody but the publishers.”

Evangelist Sunday’s brain seems to be in an abnormal whirl. He cries out: “I tell you, my friends, we need a panic in religion; the world don’t need information, it needs reforming. We are going to the devil over culture clubs,” and he expresses amazement at what he calls “audacity of a minister of the Gospel in opposing revivals—such a man is a disgrace to religion.”

Again: “It makes my blood boil to hear a man speaking of the Jews as ‘sheeny’ or Christ killers, for it will be because of a Jew if you are saved by the blood of Jesus Christ. The purest blood on the face of the earth flows through the veins of the Jew.”

Is it probable that Sunday would allow a Jewish rabbi to preach from his pulpit? I doubt it.

Again: “I never preach a sermon against the Catholics, because there is good in the Catholic church as well as in the Protestant, and there are as big hypocrites in the Catholic church as there are elsewhere, or as there are on earth. If you want to joint the Catholic church, join it; I’ll help you do it, if I can. Some of you people have not been to confession in years; you have forgotten what the priest looks like and what questions to ask. I don’t want to make a bum Protestant of a good Catholic, or a bum Catholic out of a good Protestant.”

Sunday reminds me of Swedenborg in what he claims to know about heaven and the Deity; but Swedenborg is visionary and often hard to understand, the evangelist is dogmatic and point blank.

Conceit is not absent in either of them. Swedenborg says God said to him: “I am God the Lord, the Creator and Redeemer of the world. I have chosen thee to unfold the spiritual sense of the Holy Scripture. I will myself dictate to thee what thou shalt write.”

Sunday does not say what words he has from God, but claims to know his wishes. He says: “When the time of the (last) judgment of God comes, you’ve all got to tell him what you have been doing down here. He’s going to ask you, if you’ve been to leg shows where women don’t wear enough to make a pair of leggings for a humming bird. He’s going to ask you if you’ve been hitting the booze at a Dutch lunch.”

Sunday’s heaven can have no attraction for any independent thinker or Rationalist. Goodness and purity will not land us there. Nothing will save us from hell but clinging to the robes of Jesus. In a discourse previous to his Boston visit, he said of the great evolutionist, Darwin. “There goes old Darwin; he’s in hell sure.”

In speaking of man’s prospect after death, he says, “If a man doesn’t settle his future before the undertaker pumps the embalming fluid into him, he’s a goner.”

I just heard that Sunday criticized a dead grandmother of his in a Boston sermon because she had “no faith,” and his final statement was: “She’s in hell.” Just then, two men in the audience got up and started for the door. Sunday saw them and exclaimed: “They are going to hell.” At this remark, one of the men turned, faced Sunday and said: “Have you any message we can give to your grandmother?”

I cannot vouch for the truth of this story, but give it as it was told me. Such an event would illustrate the spirit of Sunday.

I just read in a California paper a short account of the death of Jack London, and noticed that at his request no minister or priest was to officiate or choir to sing at the funeral. His remains were cremated, and the funeral private. Here is certainly a good subject for Billy Sunday to give vent to his indignation upon as having gone to hell.

Sunday said: “I could make a million a year, if I’d consent to commercialize God’s work. Do you think I’d stand here and toil like this, if I didn’t care first of all about your souls?”

If he is receiving the sums generally reported, he is not likely to die poor. His mission and that of his “Savior” appear in certain respects to run on parallel lines, but so far as we know, the latter never received any remuneration in the way of money for his services.

FRANCIS ALGER.

Yarmouth Port, Mass.

It seems to me that a “supernatural” religion—that is to say, a religion that is claimed to have been divinely founded and to be authenticated by miracles, is much easier to establish among an ignorant people than any other—and the more ignorant the people, the easier such a religion could be established. The reason for this is plain. All ignorant tribes, all savage men, believe in the miraculous, in the supernatural. The conception of uniformity, of what may be called the eternal consistency of nature, is an idea far above their comprehension. They are forced to think in accordance with their minds, and as a consequence they account for all phenomena by the acts of superior beings—that is to say, by the supernatural. In other words, that religion having most in common with the savage, having most that was satisfactory to his mind, would stand the best chance of success.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Almost every scientific advance or social reform has been opposed by Christianity. We could mention that when the art of printing was discovered, the Bishop of London said, “We must in some way destroy this infernal art, or it will some day destroy us.” We could quote John Bright, who said, “The bishops of the church of England have seldom aided legislation in the interests of humanity”; Macaulay, who says, “This church of England for a hundred and fifty years was the steady enemy of public liberty”; Lang, who says, “Education and enlightenment, as a rule, go hand in hand with the decrease of the clergy”; Spencer, who says, “But for science we should still be worshipping fetishes.”—R. C. Adams.

I have been brought to the conclusion that genuine goodness is the same, whether found inside or outside the church, and that to be an Infidel no more proves a man to be selfish, mean, and wicked, than to be evangelical proves him to be honest, just, and humane.—Frederick Douglass.

Come forth into the light of things,
Let Nature be your teacher.
She has a world of ready wealth,
Our minds and hearth to bless,
Spontaneous wisdom breathed by health,
Truth breathed by cheerfulness.

SATURDAY - - JANUARY 6, 1917.

When you scratch religion, you find only superstition.

Is a man to be blamed because he is lucky? Or, as the Christian puts it: Is a man to be blamed because God helps him?

Is the man who raises one hundred bushels of wheat to the acre the enemy of those men who raise only twenty bushels to the acre? Some men have the brains and power to reach success and others haven't.

The best prayer is the shortest one, and the one that is not heard. But it is too much to expect the best in a world which has been taught to do so much foolish praying. Prayer is not necessarily a religious effort. It is perhaps in its truest sense a secular one. The best prayer that I ever heard, and a prayer that the church might imitate, was a cry from a neighbor who yelled at the top of his voice, Help!

It is too bad that a certain bunch of Christians who boast of their love of country did not have also as much love of truth, and could not see their way clear to throw the old Bible after the old cross in their crusade against Rome. There can be no genuine emancipation from Roman Catholicism that does not free the mind from slavery to the divine character of the Bible, one of the oldest dogmas of Romanism.

I still insist that the biggest lie in circulation to-day is the old lie that has been doing business for the Christian church for the past two thousand years—that the Bible is the word of God. This lie is the great pyramid of lies, the one lie which has no peer. If the devil were to hold a fair and offer a mammoth prize on the biggest lie ever told by man this lie that the Bible is the word of God would win the money.

What good does it do to "acknowledge" a supreme being, if there be none? And what is a supreme being? A supreme being is sometimes called God. And what is God? If it is meant by either of these terms anything besides Nature, where are you going to find it? Can you go outside of Nature? If so, where do you go? One person says: Man cannot worship Nature. It isn't necessary. Nature can get along without being worshipped. L. K. W.

At the Beginning of the Year.

When we get a testimonial like the following, which is from G. W. Baldwin of Liberal, Missouri, we cannot refrain from publishing it. Mr. Baldwin writes:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a great work for mankind. I hope for its prosperity. I have read it for more than thirty years, and now at the age of 72 it is dearer than ever to me."

And old friends like Brother Baldwin are dearer than ever to THE TRUTH SEEKER. We could ask for no more cheering New Year's greeting than this brief letter.

THE TRUTH SEEKER with the present number enters upon its Forty-fourth year, and in 1917 will occur the forty-second anniversary of the date when the present Editor's connection with the paper as an employee began. Time flies. The founder of the paper, doubtless known to Brother Baldwin, has been in his grave thirty-four years; his successor, E. M. Macdonald, eight years. THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has acquired an individuality of its own, if not a soul, survives one after another; and our best wish is that it may continue so to survive until its work for mankind shall have been accomplished.

It begins its forty-fourth year with its work cut out. We are always asking TRUTH SEEKER readers to furnish the sinews of war for some fresh enterprise, and they always respond. Beyond the work in hand just now, which is waging a war of extermination on the blasphemy laws, we do not know what duties THE TRUTH SEEKER will be called upon to perform in the coming year; we only know from long experience that whatever they may be, its readers will support the paper and its coworkers in at least attempting to discharge them.

With this paper well advanced in its fifth decade and going strongly toward its jubilee number, the prospect looks attractive to us. Each week it is printing something valuable to the present and instructive for the future. There is a liberal education in the files of this journal—the material for one of the greatest books ever written. The beliefs of the world recorded in a thousand other journals will be revised and modified and many of them discarded. The truths this paper has stated from the first have not been touched or changed by the hand of time. Some of them look less radical than they did forty years ago, but that is because the attitude of those who view them is different.

The Happy New Year which THE TRUTH SEEKER wishes to all its readers they will themselves attain by philosophy, forgiving and forgetting all the errors of the past, if such there be, as resulting from a mistaken pursuit of happiness, and profiting by them. It will be the function of THE TRUTH SEEKER to make the coming year interesting, if it can. Brother Baldwin's note gives us confidence. We have no advice to give, no reproof, correction or instruction in righteousness. The principles we present and repeat and reiterate are relied upon to recommend themselves to thinking persons, and to react automatically upon conduct. And so we pass another milestone and continue the pilgrimage, with work as a companion whose name is Joy, and friends to greet whose name is Legion, and a goal whose pursuit is improving and ennobling, even if it lies beyond the place where our journey ends.

Truth, Not Destruction.

It is frequently charged that no man is so unreasonable in his condemnation of an institution or a particular phase of things, either political or economic, as he who once closely identified himself with those very things. The ex-Christian, we are told, is positively rabid in his denunciation of Christianity—for whom it is impossible to see anything good in the society of which he was once proud to be a member. Destruction seems to be his only purpose. He has nothing to offer in the place of his former belief, and yet, with a ruthlessness unworthy of such a sacred cause, he exposes mercilessly the delinquencies of the church, as if that institution had always been his greatest enemy!

In answer to this state of mind we will at first reply that it is only the thoroughly conscientious believer, who has made a careful study of his religion, that would be justified in denouncing its errors. The ex-clergyman is eminently denunciatory of Christianity, because no one knows that religion better than he. The ordinary Christian knows very little about his religion or its effect upon human society. When such a person identifies Christianity with civilization, and claims that the wonderful epoch in which we are now living is due to the excellence of his religion, we say at once that he needs to go to school and learn the A B C's of his faith. It is only the man who knows his subject well that is capable of presenting it with vigor and enthusiasm. It is not surprising that the mere tyro in the knowledge of religion should look askance at the scathing presentation of it by one who really knows it. The speaker's language becomes practically unintelligible to such a person. To-day, the Christian religion is idealistic. Civilization has forced it into this position. It is now being identified with ethics rather than with dogma. And because of this change in policy, it hopes to take on a new lease of life, and to continue for another period of time to deceive credulous humanity: but its past can never be forgotten; its crimes can never be atoned for. There can be no

Purgatory for the representative of God. When God, in the person of his church, sins against humanity, who has the power to forgive him?

Our second reply to those who are disposed to chide the vehement denouncer of a cruel and intolerant church is that the aim of the Rationalist in exposing religious impostures is not mere destruction, but the exaltation of the truth. For the Rationalist to wish simply the destruction of a religion apart from the merits of the case, would identify him too closely with the persecuting spirit which has ever been characteristic of the "true church of God." The thought paramount in the mind of the true Rationalist is anything but that of destruction. His great desire is that men shall learn the truth about everything; and when that has been secured, his hope is that a period of reconstruction will set in, when men, knowing things as they are, will build up, from this newer and better foundation, a lasting superstructure of truth and righteousness. It has been the constant practice of the church from the beginning to destroy without regard to the good qualities of the object of her wrath; and there is every reason to believe that the Holy Inquisition would be in practical force to-day were it not for the superior power of the state preventing it. A work of Canon Law which was published at Rome under the "enlightened" rule of Leo XIII. and with his emphatic approval—the Institutiones Juris Canonici of Father de Luca—proves at length the duty of the church to put to death heretics.

The denunciation of Christianity involves a question of morals, which is being constantly forgotten by those critics who find fault with the emphatic denier of its claims. The Christian religion is either true or false. Most of its adherents consider it true, while some are in doubt about it and other indifferent. The Rationalist, on the contrary, considers that its falsity has been proven. If formerly one of its disciples, he now looks upon it as an organization that has deceived him; that has disseminated untruths about him and his destiny; that has stemmed the tide of human thought and human energy; that has counseled him to disregard family ties and earthly activities for the joys of heavenly home about which it really knows nothing. The Rationalist, regarding the church, stands in the position of one who has been deceived by his particular friend, who in the presence of many witnesses declared eternal fidelity here and everywhere. Had it been a chance acquaintance who had thus deluded him, he would have experienced but a passing feeling of annoyance and indignation, but when he finds himself sorely wounded in the "house of his friend," his wrath knows no limits, and his contempt no barriers. No suavity in speech or manner of prominent and learned churchmen can lessen the chagrin which he now feels as the Rationalist contemplates the pure atmosphere of reason, justice and truth, in which he now finds himself, as contrasted with the gloomy, profitless theological environment from which a careful study of the premises has forever freed him.

"Organizations."

Are organizations "for the good of members" always a good to the community? Mr. William Plotts, disguised as "Thomas Paine, Jr.," argues in an article contributed to the magazine Out West that they are not, because through the absorption of the members in the interests of the organization they are likely to lose their national consciousness. We think that Mr. Plotts has written the article in question for the purpose of citing the church as a bad example. He says:

"We have religious organizations, which are evil in accordance with the strength of their organizations and their influence on the general public. There was a time, perhaps, when, on account of their fearsome teachings, all, or most of them, had some restraining influence on the vicious, and it is yet sometimes said that religion is a 'good thing' for women and children, but the fact that it is now not considered good form to mention one's religion in polite society shows that it is rapidly passing out of the domain of the useful, and the striving of the sects is for power only.

"Religious influence is essentially unpatriotic in its tendencies. While there is no one organization that is dominant in our country, a group of them which are somewhat akin have influence enough to have fastened themselves like barnacles on the body politic. The result of the exemption of church property from taxation which is in effect the same as a subsidy, unwelcome state-paid chaplains in the army and numerous institutions, subsidies to sectarian charities, and Sunday laws, is that all those outside of the organizations represented feel like Uitlanders. Their precious government is in the hands of the enemy for exploitation and gradually becomes the 'rotten government' for which they have lost all respect, and the dominant ones let the fealty to their organization override fealty to their real protector."

We go a long way toward agreeing with the writer regarding those organization which form, in effect, a government within a government—the imperium in imperio—such as the churches; or those that are formed to do work that legitimately belongs to the state if to anyone—such as vice societies. T. B. Wakeman used to say that it diminished his patriotism very much, even as an outsider, when the business of the state was taken over by these amateur organizations.

As for religious organizations, if their members would accept the dictum of the historian and Free-thinker, James Parton, that the only religion an American needs is the religion of the United States, they would find their church confederation unnecessary.

Churches work with the state only for the good of religion; and some of them, of which the Catholic church is an example, work uniformly against the objects of a free government like ours.

Organizations against which no objection can be made are the Free Speech League, which is memberless and has no respect for persons; and the American Secular Union, which was formed for defense against the invasion and graft of the religious organizations. The religion of these organization is the United States of America, and their creed is the national Constitution.

The Blasphemy Case Fund.

The use to which this fund is to be put has been explained.

There is pending in Waterbury, Conn., a case against Michael Mockus, arrested last summer at the instance of a Catholic priest on a charge of blasphemy. He was convicted in the police court, and demanded a jury trial. Last month the second trial was begun, but continued until March by agreement of the attorneys.

Mr. Theodore Schroeder, a member of the New York Bar and counsel for the Free Speech League, has undertaken the defense of the case and to carry it if necessary to the United States Supreme Court.

For his legal services and his own expenses Mr. Schroeder makes no charge. The cost will consist in preparing and printing the argument and brief, and these, it is supposed, the Freethinkers interested in the case will willingly pay. They will be all the more interested in doing so because this argument will be a history, a review and an analysis of the blasphemy cases in the United States, and a comparison of the blasphemy law with the constitutions of the country and the various states and their guarantees of religious liberty.

It is aimed to put the whole record into print, for distribution to the press and for deposit in the principal libraries of the country. The names of the persons who assist in the defense by contributing to the expenses of printing the volume will be included in the record; those who contribute one dollar or more will receive a copy of the book.

Such an opportunity as this to strike an effective blow at the blasphemy laws that lurk in the statute books of many states, to be invoked by priests, has not been offered before.

We are all interested in the case. Any other man is just as likely as Michael Mockus to be arrested for a criticism of the Bible. Ingersoll was threatened with the blasphemy laws of New Jersey and Delaware.

Out of the present case is to come such a history and record that the defense in future cases will be prepared in advance; and the volume cannot fail to be of value to all readers. The contributor of a dollar will get his money's worth in literature.

The books are open, then, for contributions to the printing fund, which will be received and credited at this office.

We Criticise an Editorial.

It is a Christmas editorial and, appearing in one of our New York dailies, reminds us of the article in the creed attributed by Huxley to certain clerical disputants, to wit, "Brethren, in order that we may be perfect, before all things let us lie." We quote from the editorial:

"Through motives that were of the earth, earthy, Pilate allowed the Christ to be crucified; but the empire for which the Roman potentate sacrificed himself has passed away, while that for which his victim died has outlived the ages. The glory that Pilate represented long ago crumbled into nothingness, but Christ's kingdom, created not of Cæsar but of God, has survived, and shall survive."

If we examine the Gospel story we shall find that "Christ's kingdom" was that of a heaven which was to come in that generation after his death, ascension and return to earth with the angels of his Father. That kingdom has never materialized; but on the other hand the empire which Pilate served, still lives, by the irony of history, through the Roman Catholic church, under the name of the Christ that is alleged to have been crucified; and it has kept up the record by crucifying thousands. It was created of Constantine, a successor of Cæsar, and survives by fraud.

As we have intimated, Christ's kingdom perished with him, except in the minds of a few freak sects who still hope for its establishment and the second coming. To quote again:

"This cataclysm of war, cited by pessimists and scoffers to establish that Pilate, not Christ, has prevailed over the soul of man, in reality has revealed as has no other event in history the willingness of countless millions of men to acknowledge the existence of something more precious than life itself. He who offers his blood for a cause has rejected the call of earth to heed the call of the spirit."

There were wars before Christ. Cæsar was conspicuous in some of them; and then, just as much as now, they revealed "the willingness of countless millions of men to acknowledge the existence of something more precious than life itself." They proved as much for Cæsar as for Christ.

If we accept as genuine the declaration of Christ, repudiating the notion that he came to bring peace, and believe that he said he came to bring a sword, then we may say that his empire holds sway in Europe; but as he did not invent war or introduce it on earth, the originator must be sought further back, and Pilate has a better claim to that title than Christ. So, since to the Christ we can attribute neither the introduction of war nor the call of the spirit that makes men acknowledge the existence of something more precious than life itself, where does Jesus come in? It has indeed been written of the nation served by Pilate that Romans in Rome's quarrels spared neither land nor gold; nor son nor wife, nor limb nor life, in the brave days of old. The European war does certainly prove the failure of the Christ's peace policy, if he had one.

We may as well give the rest of the editorial under criticism:

"The merriment of Christmas day as never heretofore is founded in sorrow, but has not the anniversary of Him who gave to mankind new definitions of life and death taken on, through the very source of that sadness, a deeper significance than it held before?"

In America an unparalleled amount of money was spent for Christmas gifts, and in celebrating December 25, the so-called Christmas Day; but the statement that this was "the anniversary of him who gave to mankind new definitions of life and death" is one of the lies to which we object. Yet if there was any "deeper significance" in the celebration than before, it is that the money which enabled Christians to celebrate the supposed birth of their redeemer and prince of peace with more than common lavishness came from the sale of war ammunitions to the Christian nations of Europe. If the source does not verify the view of the pessimists and scoffers that the extra money is due to the man who allowed the Christ to be crucified, there is the alternative view that it comes from the man who betrayed him.

Inquiry was lately made whether the ministers of Cleveland, Ohio, had opened a campaign against the stage. "From a very distinguished actor now appearing there," we observed, "we have an order for a dozen copies of 'Crimes of Preachers.'" But the Cleveland ministers are acquitted. The preacher who stimulated the order is the Rev. A. R. Burke, Methodist, of Binghamton, N. Y. The Rev. Burke, in a sermon, denounced actors as immoral, and weighted his argument by citing Edwin Forrest, Edwin Booth, Mary Anderson and E. H. Sothern, who, he said, had made statements justifying his attack. The sermon fell into the hands of E. H. Sothern (the very distinguished actor hereinbefore alluded to), who, in his indignation at being so quoted, wrote to the Rev. Mr. Burke telling him pointedly that he was a slanderer and always a liar. He also presented the minister with a copy of "Crimes of Preachers." The Binghamton parson, according to our informant, who is Mr. William Harris of the Sothern company, replied in a "father forgive him he knows not what he does" tone of voice, and inclosed a tract on the sin of dancing. While Sothern was contemplating how he should rejoin, he received from a lady in Binghamton, to whose attention the Rev. Burke's attack had been brought, a copy of the Republican-Herald with a marked article showing that the ministerial critic of the morality of actors was before the Binghamton courts accused of tampering with an old woman's will in order that he might secure control of her estate for himself. "The will," the piece said, "was drawn by the clergyman and was in reality his and not the decedent's will." This gave Mr. Sothern opportunity to write the Rev. Burke that he (Sothern) had made the mistake of opening a correspondence with a person who was beneath his contempt, and that he (Burke) would have to prove himself an honest man before the correspondence could be carried further. Mr. Sothern has done his profession and the public a service, which it is believed the Rev. Mr. Burke cannot claim.

Missionary Propaganda.

Most of us feel a natural delicacy about approaching our friends personally on the subject of the falseness of their religious views, and when a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER is sent them it is such a shock that it does not produce the desired results. That is natural, for its pages are for those who already know the cardinal points of Freethought, whereas the religious person must be brought to the truth gradually. The aim of this department is to act as a medium (not spiritualistic) for the diffusion of simple truths, and the Missionary Editor will gladly communicate with any whose names are submitted as persons having minds open to conviction. If any particular book or pamphlet appeals to you as the best for initial propaganda, mention that fact, and if you do not want to buy it for your friends, we may send it to them on approval.

Some may believe that a certain Christian should receive first "Bible Myths" and then "The Bible" and "The Christ," while a different order might be more suitable for another. Many a person will not read any book, but will look at a brief pamphlet such as "The Case of Billy Sunday" or "People vs. The Holy Bible." An excellent book that will not offend a Unitarian clergyman, for instance, is J. B. Bury's "History of Freedom of Thought."

Address the Missionary Editor.

If it be true that corporations have no souls, Billy Sunday must have lost his, for he has been incorporated. Perhaps he believes it necessary to lose his own soul to save others; or the object of the incorporation may be to avoid personal liability for the many libels he is prepared to utter. He is a great missionary and does perform miracles in turning men from wine to water, but we challenge him to take any average drunkard and reform him as completely in two months as a scientific cure will in one month. The object of these solemn thoughts on the onomatopoeic Sabbatarian is not to promote the sale of stock in Billy Sunday, Inc., but to emphasize the need of our counteracting mission in each city where he performs. New York is to be saved in April.

The price of the pamphlets exposing him is $2.50 a hundred, or $5 a hundred including addressing and mailing.

Our editorial selves, who are unfortunate enough to own real estate, had two experiences on December 23d. A janitor said he would join the Holy Name Society to cure himself from drinking rather than take a cure offered him; and a tenant refused to sign a lease on Friday, although "not superstitious." The former has been given a chance with the priest, but will lose his job unless he is able to get on his feet. The tenant lost three days' free rent.

SEEKING AN ELUSIVE JESUS.

More of the Neighborhood Joining in the Search For a Historical Christ.

The age-old yet ever interesting query, "Did Jesus really live?" will not down, and it appears to defy solution notwithstanding the wealth of thought and research expended towards that end.

We have been regaled by the able and learned discussion over that topic, that has proceeded for several weeks, by Messrs. Eccles, Wakefield and others: some holding with Strauss that Jesus was a purely mythical, that is, a fictitious person, while others, whose learning and poise are such as to command respect, hold with Renan that there was a real Jesus as a foundation fact for the gospel story but around whom the pious and superstitious have woven a tissue of fables.

While Mr. Eccles appears to subscribe to the Renan theory, yet he refuses to consider Renan seriously and dismisses him with the statement that he regards him as too credulous to quote.

Notwithstanding the very able, labored and philosophic introductory chapter to Renan's "Life of Christ," I cannot escape the conviction that Renan never intended his book for more than it really is—a kind of a classical religious romance, a veritable poem in prose; and as such perhaps it stands unrivaled in the world of literature.

Outside of the purely speculative interest involved, the question is unimportant, especially to Rationalists; for it is not conceivable that those who contend that there was a real Jesus would claim he was more than human or extraordinary.

Nor will it be contended that we have any reliable data to which we can refer; we must form our conclusions from mere accidental stumblings on to the truth here and there, unconscious slips of the tongue, as it were, by which the truth is evinced, although the narrative as a whole is utterly unreliable.

A witness might go on the stand and give a perjured fabrication throughout, deny his nationality, yet by his manner of speech or the unguarded use of a word betray himself and thus allow the truth to become known.

Should a careful examination and analysis of the Biblical writings fail to create the belief of a real Jesus in the judicious mind, I take it there is no other history to which we can refer; for so far as I am aware the scholars of the world are practically unanimous in conceding that the passages in Josephus alluding to Jesus are interpolations, while the believing and non-believing world agree that the apocryphal gospels are pure forgeries.

Now, will not all calm, unbiased and discriminating minds agree, after a conscientious examination of the gospel writings, that about one-half consists of the miraculous and the incredible, and the other half the improbable?

The incredible will discredit the birth, the performing of miracles, and the rise from death and ascension to heaven.

The improbable will discredit the flight to Egypt, the edict to slay the children, the ministry of John the Baptist, and even the Sermon on the Mount.

Did you ever in your life, like Joseph, have a dream to do a certain thing? Are not all dreams in some manner a recurrence of past experience or impressions, oftentimes fantastically arranged, but never constructive in character?

And suppose Herod was made to believe, as the gospels imply, that by divine determination Jesus had been selected or predestined to be king of the Jews and supplant his royal line, is it credible that he could have believed he might frustrate the purposes of the Almighty by destroying the Almighty's son?

And if all Jerusalem and Judea went out to John the Baptist to be baptized by him, preparatory to the advent of Jesus, is it not probable Jesus would have been received en masse by the people when he did come? Man has ever been too credulous, too prone to become the dupe of some faker, rather than circumspect to detect fraud; and unless the generality of the people of Judea had a higher intelligence than they are generally credited with Jesus or any other man of good leadership could have gotten a large following.

Even in this day of enlightenment, of free schools and printing presses, we are witnesses to the facility with which a Dowie, Eddy, Joe Smith or Pastor Russell can marshal adherents.

Another thing. How was the Sermon on the Mount preserved? What stenographer was there to report the speech; and who recorded in several instances what is said to have passed privately between persons?

There is only one way to believe the gospel writings, and that is the orthodox way. Accept the supernatural; then suspend the laws of reason and adopt the inspirational theory.

Again, if Jesus was a real person, he at least is pictured in the accounts given us of him, as a most unreal one. He either did not have the natural passions of a man, or subdued them to an incredible degree.

There appears nothing of conjugal love or desire; no evidence that he cared for pleasure; no occasional mirth, universal in normal men; no craving for wealth, power or social position—things that are commendable in themselves and blessings when properly used. We have the picture of a gloomy, melancholic, serious man whose portion was all sorrow and tears without any cheer, smiles or laughter. What would the world be if we were all so constituted—all "perfect"?

If Jesus lived, how does it come that no contemporary chronicler makes mention of him? If he was so obscure, as Renan implies, as to escape their notice, then the gospel writings are again falsified, since according to them he was a man of considerable prominence, having great throngs following him, and appearing conspicuously in driving the money changers out of the temple. Suppose an obscure busybody should enter a church and break up a church fair, or a ladies' aid society gathering; would he not get a headline in the next morning newspaper and an escort to the calaboose thrown in?

The crucifixion is improbable, for the reason that, according to the account, the laws prevailing at the time were not complied with in the trial and execution. We feel justified then in asserting that one-half of the gospel narrative is incredible and impossible, and the other half improbable.

We wish Dr. Eccles had been a little more specific in the statement of the facts upon which he relies to create a belief in the reality of the existence of Jesus. Of course it is a generally accepted truism that all fiction has a foundation in fact and on that basis some may erroneously reason that Jesus must have had an existence.

But the fact upon which the fiction rests may be other than the existence of some person in it. No one will claim a real existence for Ivanhoe; yet the novel "Ivanhoe" was founded on a fact, that fact being the social conditions in England at the time the plot was laid and which it is the purpose of the book to portray.

Allow us to submit a little theory of our own, to be taken for what it is worth; at least it will have the merit of originality.

There flourished before and at the time Jesus is supposed to have lived in Judea a kind of a fraternal order or society known as Essenes. It is known that the time in which Jesus is supposed to have lived were marked by civil commotions and great national and social turbulences and disturbances culminating in the destruction of the Jewish capital and the slaying and enslavement of the people.

Although we have no history for it, is it not probable that out of this order of Essenes a religious offshoot may have evolved, unnoted during the distractions of the times, and that this offshoot finally became distinctively religious and its connection with the parent order forgotten and obscured? And partaking of the nature of its surroundings and the calamities of the times, the membership of this order may have become gloomy, austere, morose. Is it not possible that some such order may have been the origin of the Christian church; and that, since there was no contemporary account of its origin, which was buried in oblivion, some one undertook to write a little religious romance giving a history of the order? And inasmuch as everything must have a personality to make it understandable, a hero was created with the name of Jesus to personify or exemplify this order or society and to make manifest its spirit, as Ivanhoe personifies the spirit of knight-errantry.

Is it not possible that the story of Jesus grew out of a state of facts like the above?

Were not the Jewish people of that time a people of sorrows and acquainted with griefs, so that Jesus, as a man of sorrows, was a mere personification of a nation afflicted with calamities? And is it not natural that the romancer, in undertaking to give an account of the origin of the church, which was none other than an offshoot of the Essenes, would depict its founder as a heavenly visitor of austere mien to glorify it with a divine authentication?

The ancients who believed the world to have had a foundation or supporter created the mythical Atlas for that office; and so the progenitors of the Christians, supposing the order must have had an originator, created the mythical Jesus to be it; when, as a matter of fact, the church may not have been the work of any one or any set of men, but a gradual development unnoted at the time.

And even these gospel writings themselves are in all probability the work of many contributing agents; for no one could believe that the writer of the twenty-eighth verse of the seventeenth chapter of Matthew, and of the eighth verse of the twenty-seventh chapter of the same book, were one and the same person or that they were written at the same time. The one would appear to have been written while there were still living those who were contemporaries of Jesus, and the other a long time afterwards.

It is a muddled, chaotic affair; and if the probabilities preponderate in favor of the existence of a real Jesus I am not able to see it.

HUGH M. MARTIN.

Before It Is Too Late.

U. S. Grant, leader of the victorious army in the civil war, twice President of the United States, one of the most far-seeing strategists, statesmen, and thinkers, in his famous oration in Des Moines, prophesied a state of affairs which now seems to be here, or at least approaching rapidly.

General Grant said: "If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side, and superstition, ambition and ignorance on the other." And he added: "Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the more perfect security of free thought, free speech, and free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespective of nationality, color or religion."

This was U. S. Grant's prediction. Whether or not he overrated the courage and manliness of the free and independent thinkers, he certainly did not overrate the powers of ignorance and superstition which work day and night. They employ men like Sunday, Forsythe, Weigle, etc., to create hysteria and fanaticism as did the zealots in medieval ages. The entire press, with magistrates, politicians, statesmen, the pulpit and the school, are pressed into their service. There is no expense too costly, no effort too much to bring about the most complete mental enslavement of the masses.

That mental liberty fought for and given us by Jefferson, Madison, Adams, Franklin is gone. The Bible is read in the public schools of many states. Taxpayers pay for prayers for the inspiration of congressmen and statesmen which they indeed sorely need, but generally do not get from the New Jerusalem, but from Wall street. Libraries, museums, art galleries, concert halls, and other places of entertainment and instruction are closed on the "holy Sabbath day," the only day in the week that most people have time to visit them. The darkness of the mouldering grave is spread over the day of recreation. Children are taught religious phrases, religious songs, religious sayings in public schools, and the superstitions are so closely interwoven with their learning that the minds of children are early warped and distorted. Professors of Universities are dismissed for refusing to get their information of natural science and astronomy from the legends of a half-barbarian people—dreamed by them in the state of immaturity and undevelopment, and now repudiated by themselves and cast aside. Instead of freeing the houses of widows and orphans from taxes, partly or wholly, we tax the poor and free the church, archbishops' palaces and priests' residences to the amount of untold hundreds of millions from taxation—even "church land" held for speculation by bishops and rich parsons. Public funds are used for the purposes of supporting superstition under innumerable pretenses: Indian education, charitable purposes, educational purposes, etc. The hydra of superstition and ignorance, with its thousand heads, works day and night and works successfully.

He who does not see Grant's prediction in the fulfillment, as far as the powers of darkness are concerned, is blind, deaf, dumb, stunted, hypnotized, and mentally paralyzed.

But the question is: Has he overrated us? Are we not so weak, cowardly and lazy as to let darkness overcome us? Will not the money-greed, the lust for comfort and cheap peace make our free minds cringing slackers, rather than manly fighters for truth, liberty, human rights, and our children's happiness?

The undersigned has endeavored to rouse the masses against the powers of ignorance and superstition for the last four years. But without co-operation mass meetings cannot be arranged, literature distributed, Rationalist societies organized.

Shall we idle away our time while darkness overtakes us?

Beware! Before it is too late!

FREEDOM FOR THE MOVIES.

Like Art and the Press, the Motion Pictures Have Absurd Censorship to Fight.

One of the large moving picture companies has been shrewd enough to retain a trained Rationalist speaker to interpret its exhibitions to the public and to advocate freedom of expression for the film artist—all the week and Sunday—without interference from the local censor and the blue law enforcers. Dr. Sam Atkinson, who has been reporting to THE TRUTH SEEKER for some years from lectureships in the northwest, and from San Francisco and Los Angeles, California, is now with one of these companies and making occasional digressions to speak before liberal societies. The informing address which follows, by him entitled "Freedom of Expression and the Motion Pictures," was delivered before the clergy and social workers of Denver, Colorado. It is worthy of wide reading, in view of the aggressions of the censors and Sabbatarians.

By SAM ATKINSON.

The motion picture industry is a continuation of the art of printing, and just as Gutenberg met with tremendous opposition when he introduced that art, so motion picture producers and exhibitors are being harassed to-day. Last year over four hundred millions of dollars were spent at the motion picture theatres, and of this amount one hundred millions were expended in the production of pictures. The industry now ranks fifth in order in the United States, and renders a more equitable distribution of its profits than any other. It is the only industry in which a white-haired old man can get a job, and every member of the family down to the baby may be a wage-earner.

The middle-aged can remember when the newspapers first began to use illustrations. We thought the cartoon was a distinct advance in journalism, but now we go to the movies to see actual happenings in all parts of the world, and to-morrow we shall be teaching our children geography by showing them pictures of peoples and scenes we have have heretofore only been able to describe orally.

Yet this industry is hampered by the bugaboo of censorship. In addition to a national board, every city, town and hamlet has a local board who determine what shall and what shall not be thrown upon the screen. This idea of local censorship is a relic of puritanic days, and is working a hardship upon every branch of the industry and the community at large. Censorship is contrary to the Constitution of the United States, which declares for freedom of assembly and freedom of the press. Freedom of the press and freedom of the screen are one and the same, since one is a continuation of the other, and both represent freedom of expression. Even the most puritanical critic of the movies would raise his hands in righteous horror if the local editor had to submit a proof of his editorial to the police department before he could print it, yet this is precisely what is being expected of the picture man.

The absurdity of censorship may best be illustrated by the following experience: Some years ago a friend of mine, then a clergyman in New York, preached a sermon that attracted wide attention. He was invited to repeat the sermon in many of the most prominent pulpits. In the course of time he enlarged upon his theme and made the sermon into a lecture, which was delivered upon the Chautauqua platforms to large and enthusiastic audiences. Then he enlarged the lecture, added love interest, and created a novel which ranks among the best sellers in American literature. When he preached his sermon, no church official came to him and said, "You cannot preach upon that subject." No Chautauqua manager objected to the discussion of the question before his audiences. Nobody went to the office of Doubleday, Page & Company, crying, "You must not publish that book." But immediately Thomas Dixon had "The Clansman" made into a picture by that master craftsman, D. W. Griffiths, eighty-six thousand dollars had to be spent in the fighting of local censor boards throughout the country.

It must be conceded that the most advanced educational school of the present day is the stage. The modern drama has done more to rationalize modern thinking than any other agency. Motion picture producers have followed closely the efforts of the dramatists, and the educational value of the industry is still in its infancy. The Pathoscope, with its non-inflammable film, enables the chemist to show the uses of liquid air, the college professor to demonstrate the evolution of the butterfly from the caterpillar, and scores of our great industries are equipping their salesmen with machines to show the various departments of manufacture through which their products pass. The Ford Company and the Curtis Publishing Company have conducted educational campaigns throughout the theatres of the country, and still the industry is in its infancy. The time is coming when our trans-continental trains will relieve the monotony of night travel by showing passengers motion pictures of the country through which they pass at night, and even our churches will find it necessary to maintain their attendance by "sermons for the eye." For this fuller expression there must be no handicaps, but all the people must have their tastes satisfied.

Local boards of censorship are an absurdity because in their decisions they lack uniformity. Chicago passes upon a picture Los Angeles turns down. In the state of New York "The Traffickers" is considered immoral, yet it was passed upon in Pennsylvania. It may not be shown in Illinois, but it is perfectly proper in Ohio. If a picture is immoral in Kansas it is none the less immoral in California. If it is right for a production to be shown in Oregon it must be right for the same production to be viewed in New Jersey. Yet these idiosyncrasies prevail in our liberty-loving land. Why are these conditions allowed to exist? Probably the only reason is because the greater portion of that $400,000,000 is received at the box offices on Sunday, and this revenue means a falling off from the collections in the pet institution of the moralists, the church. Economic determinism appeals to them as well as everybody else.

Recently, the exhibitors in a Western city were threatened with the closing of their theatres on Sunday. A meeting was called in the mayor's parlor to discuss the question. The exhibitors wired for the writer to present their side of the case. I listened for over two hours to eloquence unexcelled. The Catholic priest was the only clergyman in the room who treated me with civility. My speech lasted exactly three minutes. This is the gist of it: "Mr. Mayor, are you aware that there are seven thousand Jews in your city? Are you also aware that you have sixteen thousand Seventh Day Adventists? The Jews observe their Sabbath from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday. The Adventists regard Saturday as their Sabbath. Are you going to curtail the liberty of these twenty-three thousand people, Mr. Mayor, and compel them to observe a day they cannot conscientiously recognize? There are only thirty-two million nine hundred and thirty-six thousand four hundred and forty-five church members in a population of one hundred millions. They are in the minority. Are you going to say that all the others shall be subservient to their desires?" Needless to say, the Sabbath Day Observance law received a jolt. The mayor possibly began to calculate how many voters there were among the twenty-three thousand. The picture shows are still running on Sunday in that city.

The same argument may be applied to censorship. There are no seven people in any city competent to decide what is moral and what is immoral for the entire population of that city. All moral law is based upon utility. We require no revelation from heaven to tell us what is right or wrong. Utility demands that the people who have been working six days shall seek what recreation they require upon the seventh. Herbert Spencer has settled the question for us in his famous epigram, "Equal liberty is that state or condition of society in which every man shall do as he wills, provided he interferes not with like liberty in another." Liberty is the only remedy for these abuses. No producer is going to spend a quarter of a million to produce a picture that is questionable. The only censorship permitted should be that which is shown by the box-office receipts. Vox Populi Vox Dei is applicable to this wonderful modern industry.

Another argument against local censorship may be found in the fact that the people selected for service upon these boards are usually incompetent to measure the public pulse. An example of this may be cited. When "Damaged Goods" was viewed by the Censor Board in Los Angeles it was immediately turned down. The chairman, a man who gave the impression that he was an ex-preacher, closed his eyes and said, "I never want to see that picture again. I can see it now. It makes me shudder." The very reason why the picture ought to be shown! If it had such an effect upon a sanctimonious old humbug like him, it would be very wholesome indeed for the young man who is confronted by the temptations offered in all our large cities. A society woman said that she objected to the picture because in introducing Mrs. Forsyth, the friend of the family, the producers were casting a reflection upon "our society." "If that scene had depicted such a happening in a working man's family, I should not have objected to it." Working men as a rule have no time for such frivolities, and "her society" is without a doubt much more rotten with disease than that of the working class. In summing up on this now famous picture the chairman said: "The Board cannot change its mind." When the individual members of the board were questioned they answered without a single exception, "I cannot change my mind." Probably, poor creatures, they did not realize the truth of that statement. The individual who cannot change his mind has no mind to change, and this represents the mentality of the majority on these local boards.

It is only fair to state that since the above-mentioned exhibition the people of Los Angeles have abolished the local board and are abiding by the decision of the national board. Through the cooperation of Mrs. Estelle Lawton Lindsay, the lone woman member of the city council, and former Mayor Sebastian, we were able to convince the city council, with one notable exception, of the absurdity of having a censorship board in the metropolis of the industry. Strange to say, the one exception was the Socialist representative. Why he objected is a mystery, because the Socialists as a rule are in the fore-front of any fight against aggression. Utility again proved to be the determining factor in this fight. Had not the Fox Company refused to establish their studio in Los Angeles unless local censorship was abolished, and some twenty other companies threatened to leave for Florida, I am afraid the end would not have been accomplished.

A very important phase of the injustice done by this censorship is that invariably the local boards pitch upon the worth-while productions and pass by the really questionable. Richard Bennett fought hard to present "Damaged Goods" in the spoken drama. The American people clearly showed approval by their patronage. When the picture was filmed this approval was overlooked. A howl of protest went up all over the country. Pulpit, press and platform had been alike silent upon this great evil. Eugene Brieux had, in an iconoclastic manner, shocked the people into sensibility. The public began to recognize that we had been spending millions to perfect the breeding of our horses, dogs and poultry, but this disease had been allowed to pester the human race adown the ages without any check whatever. David the psalmist suffered from it and lodged his complaint, but not until Nieser's discovery in 1874 had much attention been paid to it, and Brieux popularized the study of it. The censors immediately cried, "How shocking? Our children ought not to see these things." A strange thing about the Puritan is that he usually credits his child with being a fool. The children to-day know more about sex by the time they are twelve years of age than many of their parents can tell them. We have allowed our children to pick up this knowledge as though it were filth from the gutter. That is why sex questions are the subject of ribald jokes in every branch of our society, and, incidentally, that is why sex problems fill the motion picture theatre. The attitude of the censor may be controlled subconsciously by the idea that the film is doing along these lines the work which somebody else has neglected. A prominent Western clergyman confided to me that he felt that the theatre was the wrong place to teach these great truths. He sorrowfully agreed that no other agency had attempted it when I enquired if he had ever dealt with the subject in the pulpit. A Denver clergyman interrupted me in conversation with the manager of a local theatre one day by saying, "You fellows cannot do what the church has been trying to do for two thousand years." Very true. We have not been trying to keep the people in ignorance. After two thousand years we still have prostitution. The church has failed to establish the single standard of morals, and nothing will establish it until the people are educated to such a degree that they recognize that utility demands it. We are not trying to educate the people; we are actuated by box-office receipts, and we desire the liberty to present that which our patrons desire to see. Through this medium and these methods there is bound to be an educational value. All we plead for the motion picture screen is that we shall have the same liberty vouchsafed to us that is granted to every other institution in our land.

The far reaching influence of this question is worthy of consideration. Shall we go back to puritanism and the terrors of the middle ages, or shall we press on to a wider freedom of expression? The little town of Greeley in Colorado cannot see a Theda Bara picture because the local board of censors imagine that Theda Bara in real life is the type of character she depicts upon the screen. The same board refused to allow "Three Weeks" to be shown because Elinor Glyn's book is not permitted to rest upon the shelves of the local library. And this is the land of liberty.

Dr. Abbott's Limitations.

Dr. Lyman Abbott is more liberal, more emancipated than most ministers, but his thought, slipping along easily for awhile, seems to catch on some snag before it reaches the logical conclusion. In the Outlook for December 20th he writes as follows:

"The aristocracy of piety divides men into two classes: children of God, and children of the devil, sometimes more courteously called children of the flesh. Thus religion, which should unite men in one great brotherhood, is made to divide them into castes, represented by a wide and almost impassable crevasse. In the older Calvinism this crevasse is impassable; no man can bridge it. . . .

The aristocrat of piety may pity his less fortunate neighbor, he may patronize him, he may even preach to him; but he does not fellowship him. . . .

Brother is a word he reserves for the members of his own Church. . . .

The aristocrat of piety may walk with God, but he certainly does not walk humbly with God. He does not let his light shine; he flashes it. . . .

In order that little children might not be excluded they were baptized, and the conceit of baptismal regeneration was invented—the conceit that putting water on an unconscious babe brought it within the range of God's love. . . .

I had supposed that the doctrine, which limits the love of God to a portion of the human race, as to the Jews or the baptized or the elect or the repentant, had pretty much disappeared from at least all of the Protestant churches. But an "Unknown Friend" has recently sent me a copy of the Sunday-School Times in which the doctrine of universal brotherhood of man is denied, and the doctrine that only Christians are the sons of God and only Christians are brothers is affirmed with an explicitness which leaves no room for misunderstanding. From this article I quote two sentences and one paragraph. The Sunday-School Times emphasizes its denial of the universal Fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man by italicizing the two sentences which, in copying from the Times, I also italicize:

"There is no such thing as the universal brotherhood of man."

"There is no universal Fatherhood of God. God is not the Father of all men."

"The natural brotherhood of human blood is the brotherhood of the family and fatherhood of Satan. The supernatural brotherhood won through the shed blood of Jesus Christ is the brotherhood of believers, who alone have entered into the family of God, and to whom alone he can become Father. There can be no brotherhood between those families whose fathers are respectively God and Satan."

The writings of both the Old Testament and the New Testament, embracing almost every type of literature, and covering a period of over a thousand years, are made one book by their fundamental doctrine that man is the offspring of God, made in God's image, and in man, therefore, we are to look for the image of God; that God is a righteous God. . . .

The whole Bible from cover to cover is an amplification, illustration, or application of these fundamental truths concerning man, God, and the relation between the two. . . .

This general teaching of the Bible—the universal fatherhood of God, the universal brotherhood of man, and that the conduct of life is the true test of character—is confirmed by the universal instinct of humanity. . . .

For sixty years I have been studying the Bible. In it I have found light upon every problem of our complex life—social, ethical, spiritual. For in it I have found the unveiling of God in the experience of man. From it I have learned that we are all his offspring made in his image. Into us all he has breathed the breath of his own life. He walks with us incognito; present with us, though unseen; speaking in us, though his voice is not recognized. . . .

Abbott evidently believes in an anthropomorphic God, and that the Bible correctly describes the relations between God and man. He affirms the universal fatherhood of God notwithstanding the teaching in both Old and New Testaments of a chosen race and salvation for the few. He apparently thinks that God is interested in every act and thought of each individual. Does not even the kaiser do the same? A. M.

Book Notes.

It is always satisfactory to meet with a book that covers a large range of associated subjects, and yet deals with them in a reasonably full and accurate manner. Such a book is the splendid work of James B. Alexander called, "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind." The author's aim in this book is to point out that "organisms instead of being hand-made and purposive, are machine-built machines, and operated, when built, by forces outside of themselves." In other words, he endeavors to prove that things come about naturally and as a matter of course when due forces become organized to operate on properly organized instruments. The true course of knowledge is not from above downward, but from below upward, and but little progress is possible where this principle is ignored. The advancement of the present generation has been greatly assisted by its partial emancipation from the dominance of the past with its essentially vicious metaphysical methods. "The study of dynamic agencies and the influences justified by the inductive method of considering them, furnish us with all the real knowledge of causes and effects that we possess."

As already intimated, this book covers a large range of subjects. Besides dealing with matters purely scientific, it embraces also such topics as habit, memory, pleasure and pain, the will, language; and adds to its completeness by devoting a special chapter to "Theological Considerations." Too much cannot be said of the scholarly treatment imparted by the author to all the scientific subjects considered. There are in all 87 chapters. It would not be possible in this place to enumerate all their titles but we can safely say that there are few subjects of permanent interest to the ordinary reader for which he will not find some consideration here from the standpoint of exact science. Anyone who is fond of science, or who enjoys a scientific discussion of a more or less familiar idea, will find this work a perfect treasury of good things. For a single book, it embraces more topics than any similar publication known to the writer of this note. The scope of the undertaking required 1,067 pages for its fulfillment. In addition there are 400 illustrations of a technical character, which, besides elucidating the text, help greatly to fix the subject in the mind of the reader.

A happy feature of this book is that while the subject treated is occasionally an abstruse one, the language is always clear and simple, and can be readily understood by everyone having the desire and mental capacity to consider scientifically the natural universe, and man's relation to it. With this book in hand, or rather, with its contents in the mind, one would be fairly well equipped to meet the ordinary controversialist in debate upon the popular topics usually dwelt upon in science and their relation to religion. The book is in its second edition, which speaks well for it as a popular and reliable manual of useful scientific information. It is a handsome volume, well printed, and is published and sold by the Truth Seeker Company for $2.75.

The Struggle between Science and Superstition. By Arthur M. Lewis. C. H. Kerr & Co., Chicago. Price, 50 cents.

This book is the result of a lecture given in Garrick Theatre, Chicago. It is the seventh in a series bearing as a general title the name prefixed to this work. The primary intention of the author is to present in a convenient form a brief survey of the warfare between Science and Religion. Heretofore, this discussion has been largely confined to great and expensive books, such as those of Draper and Dr. White, and not always accessible to the ordinary reader. In this book there is presented, after the manner of the story teller, some of the most interesting events in the world-wide struggle between intellect and superstition. In the chapter on "The Alexandria Tragedy" there is narrated the story of the philosopher, Hypatia, whom Kingsley immortalized in his novel of the same name. There is not much authentic information extant concerning this eminent woman, but what there is, the author of this book records in a pleasing way. His chapters on Bruno and Galileo are models of clearness and conciseness, a careful perusal of which would repay even the person familiar with the subject. In the chapters on "The Antagonists," that is, the contestants mentioned in the title, and "Christians and Emperors," he is particularly interesting and edifying, and there is no possible way of avoiding the strength and conclusiveness of his deduction. We highly recommend this work as a suitable manual for beginners in the study of truth; and, to quote from the preface, "a book which one might give to another with the object of securing a new convert to the cause of intellectual liberty."

That Revival of Religion.

"Sooner or later, truth will out. Two years ago, the parsons were loudly boasting that there was a marvelous revival of religion everywhere. After a while it was discovered that no revival had taken place in this country, but we were assured that it was proceeding at a fine rate in France. Then came Dr. Paul Sabatier and dissipated this delusion. But a revival must be going on somewhere, and the bishop of London went over and found it among our own soldiers at the front. Then the Rev. Dr. Horton, the notorious miracle-lover, waxed exceedingly fervent while describing the incredible miracles of conversion performed in the trenches. If we had an Atheist here, he said, a visit to the trenches would quickly make him an ardent believer. Two years ago the Rev. F. C. Spurr confidently predicted the speedy collapse of the Free-thought Movement, with all its prophets, and the certain triumph of Christianity. Speaking at Oxford the other day, Mr. Spurr sorrowfully admitted that there is no revival of religion anywhere, not even at the front."

The foregoing analysis of the situation as regards a quickening of the religious conscience is from the London Freethinker. Anyone who is informed as to the elements that enter into a revival of religion would be justified in doubting, in advance of investigation, the truth of what writers have said about the conversions alleged to have taken place in Europe since the beginning of the war. We know how revivals are effected.

We know that certain factors are essential, and we know that these have not been present at the front.

For a revival of religion a revivalist is needed, with organized and protracted effort. Protestants have been holding revivals and Catholics have been holding "missions"—another name for the same thing—for centuries; and they are all run in the same way. The machinery has been improved, from the schoolhouse meeting to the tabernacle gathering, but it is all an evolution from the simple to the complex, retaining, however, the original features.

In its simplest form the revival consists of the revivalist, the exhortation, and the free will offering. They say it is the Holy Spirit working, but that is too much like the explanation of the virgin birth. It does not occur in the absence of the exhorter and the collection.

Is somebody working Europe and the front, laying down sawdust trails, inviting people to shake hands and take Jesus as a personal savior; singing hymns and passing the hat; relating stories about the deathbeds of Infidels; proving the story of Jonah by citing the experiences of sailors lost overboard; then singing another hymn and advancing the plate? If so there may be a revival of religion there. Otherwise not. The effect is not had without the cause.

Unless the evangelist is getting his, nobody is converted or revived.

To be as good as our fathers, we must be better. Imitation is not discipleship. When some one sent a cracked plate to China to have a set made, every piece in the new set had a crack in it.—Wendell Phillips.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The license vote in Boston was a deadly blow at the prestige of the gutter evangelist, because it put the effect of his preaching to a test that could be measured. After his revival in Paterson, N. J., several saloons went out of business. It is true that their licenses had expired and the proprietors had never contemplated renewing them, yet the fact of their suspension gave a little color to the claim that revivalism is bad for the liquor traffic. We hear it said by people who profess to have looked over the ground after a revival that while they take no stock in Billy Sunday's hell-fire preaching, they have to admit that things are changed by it for the better. This, of course, is a mere matter of opinion. The result is only to be guessed at, to be estimated, or to be judged by uncertain standards at best. When the question is put to vote as it was in Boston, and the vote counted; and when the returns show, as they did in Boston, that more persons voted against the evangelist's recommendations than a year ago, and fewer for them, a reliable test of his influence is made. It shows that if the evangelist changed a vote he changed it against the very thing he was trying to boost. As a temperance town he made Boston worse than before. It is likely, also, that he made more unbelievers than converts; and it is possible that those he converted are not so desirable citizens now as they were in the natural state.

Some gentlemen who may or may not be competent observers recently discussed New York and the greatest temptations it offers to young men. All of the answers—drink, gambling, and high life—are easily guessed, except one; that is, one of the gentlemen said that the great temptation to young men was young women. He had not forgotten Eve or Mrs. Potiphar. Conceding the existence of the temptations, the Rev. Dr. Fred Winslow Adams, pastor of St. Andrew's church, gathered some opinions on the best safeguards against them. Here they are:

"High aims," says Andrew Carnegie.

"Interest in one's fellow man," Misha Applebaum.

"The influence of a good home and mother," Dr. Lyman Abbott.

"A healthy interest in good things," Sir Rabindranath Tagore.

"Education," Arthur Brisbane.

"The will to resist," Oscar S. Straus.

"Recognizing God as a present and practical help," Henrietta Crosman.

"A sense of proper values in life," Paul Monroe, dean of the Teachers Training School.

"The resolve to be honest, kind and happy, harking back somewhere to a mother's love and mother's God," Irving Batcheller.

"A habit of good thought, the recollection of those who trained and influenced them, and the aversion to weakness and vice which such training and influence inspire. For those not so trained the greatest safeguard must be merely the fear of consequences," Booth Tarkington.

To these prescriptions, pious or practical, Mr. Thomas A. Edison, professing to know nothing about it because he has been too busy to be tempted, adds a suggestion:

"If I were to hazard a guess as to what young people should do to avoid temptation it would be to get a job and work at it so hard that temptation would not exist for them."

The counsel is multitudinous and perhaps contains wisdom. Two of the counsellors name woman as the safeguard, in both instances the mother, and in one her deity. Can none of these gentlemen bring up the reminiscence of finding himself as a youth keeping nearest to the straight path under the influence of his girl—his "steady"? We should grant her an equal restraining power with the mother. Again, speaking of religious motives, how about the fear of hell—the "hangman's whip," as Burns called it? Has orthodoxy so far receded in intelligent minds that this one best wager of the priests is forgotten? Nobody speaks even of saving the young from temptation by putting the fear of God into their hearts. Mr. Carnegie's "High aims" may work if realizing them does not lead to worse results; so will Mr. Edison's steady job if he supplements it with General Wingate's plan of plenty of play. Occupation for head and hand is the safeguard. Some years ago, when Count Boni de Castellane was a head liner in the newspapers, a group of commuters waiting in the station for the 6 A. M. local, discussed the morning's report on the pranks of that scion of nobility, and it was remarked by one and agreed to by the rest that if Boni were compelled to catch the 6 A. M. local every day he would go home earlier at night and sleep in his own bed. The sanctions of morality and safeguards against temptations are found now in what is called utility. The immoral is unsanitary and antisocial. Yielding to temptation interferes with efficiency. If Mr. Brisbane, when he says "Education," means education in these facts he has hit the nail on the head. Booth Tarkington supplies the mental motive—good thought, with the alternative of fear of consequences. Induce the young man to substitute a wish to be clean and straight for the ambition to be thought as tough as they make 'em, or even for a feeling of indifference, and he is saved. That is all there is in reforming, and it takes place either with or without "conversion," most often without, though not so loudly advertised. The old idea that yielding to temptation is a "sin" is not so much considered in these days. The sin theory is ineffective, because sins are so easily and cheaply forgiven, while the realization that vice is an infraction of natural law whose penalties are never remitted supplies to the intelligent an adequate restraint. The notion of the late Hugh O. Pentecost that the way to overcome a temptation is to yield to it has a medicinal value when the yielding produces a revulsion or reaction, as sometimes occurs. The solution is Rationalism applied to conduct. But two theological allusions occur in the symposium of Dr. Adams, and none of the contributors mentions Christ.

It is a common saying to-day among religionists that when the war has come to an end there will be a great revival of religion throughout the world. This is not the view of the matter that is engaging the attention of the most thoughtful minds of the belligerents, but rather this thought: Is the war destroying faith in Christianity? This inquiry is frequently met with, for instance, among the educated classes in Germany. Recent articles in the Kreuzzeitung might seem to indicate that an affirmative answer has already been given to this important question. This newspaper, which is the favorite organ of the military class, publishes a quarterly review of ecclesiastical affairs. The last review contained the reports of field chaplains, which went to show that many of the intellectual leaders of the soldiers believe the destruction of the old faith is now inevitable. These reports state that the work of Arthur Bonus, a new German writer, is being much read. Bonus has said: "Christianity gives us no answer to the question, How am I to reach the position of ruler of the world? Christianity is a foreign spiritual yoke for us, and if we are to be united we must make ourselves free of its fetters, and seek for our own system of piety." That actual religion at the front is at a low ebb the Kreuzzeitung finds little reason to doubt. Such as exists there is mostly a "religion of drum fire," the newspaper rather sorrowfully admits. A religion that required such a lavish expenditure of human lives and possessions as is now being witnessed in the war in Europe, in order to awaken its adherents to a sense of their duty towards it, ought obviously to pass away, as being a great evil and a ghastly deterrent to the upward progress of the race.

Religious and legal questions are involved in the following circumstances described by the El Centro correspondent of the Los Angeles Daily Times:

"Whether the oath of an Infidel can be accepted by the court must be decided by Justice of the Peace Isaac Mayfield at the preliminary hearing of William Brown, negro, charged with shooting Ali Singah, a Hindu.

"Brown was recently arrested, charged with stealing corn from Singah, who pursued him with a gun. In the struggle that followed Brown gained possession of the Hindu's gun and shot him three times in the stomach. Singah's friends rushed to his rescue and Brown was shot four times in the legs.

"John E. Berry, attorney for Brown, will ask the court to discharge the prisoner on the grounds that Ali Singah and his five companions are Infidels and that they should not be allowed to testify, as the oath is not binding to them. If the court rules that Attorney Berry's contentions are right, Brown will be discharged, as the only witnesses for the State are Hindus."

The outcome of the case, now a month old, is not reported. The Negro is a Christian; the Hindu doubtless Mohammedans. In a Mohammedan country Brown would be the infidel and Singah and his coreligionists the true believers; which shows to what an extent faith depends upon geography, and how right was Huxley when he said that infidel was a term of reproach which Mohammedans and Christians, in their modesty, agree in applying to those who differ from them.

"Despite the optimism of some of our writers who like to hear the truth about the Presbyterians, but hate to hear it about themselves," said Father Browne, S. J., in St. Ignatius church, Manhattan, a few Sundays ago, "the Church (Roman Catholic) is losing thousands of her people in America through mixed marriages, proselyting soupers, the rapid degeneracy of the public conscience, avarice, aping the Gentiles, godless schools, lack of zeal for souls on both sides of the sanctuary rail, dearth of clergy for the immigrants, and related causes." This is one of the most encouraging pieces of news that has come to our attention in a long time. Ample testimony has been given for some years past to the decadence of Protestantism both by its friends and its foes, but it is a novelty in Christendom for the Roman Catholic church to give evidence against itself. We may assure ourselves that in this instance the truth is being spoken, and that Romanism is gradually losing its hold upon its followers. Once the exodus is begun, there is every reason to hope that it will continue with increasing momentum, until that old corypheus of intolerance, tyranny and superstition shall have passed into innocuous desuetude. Many hurtful things die hard; but they die. And unless human nature changes greatly within the next five decades, the opposition to politico-papalism will then have become so strong that even the guileful suavity of the polished Jesuit shall not be sufficient to check the mighty current of its influence.

Here is a news item, from a paper dated the day before Christmas, which needs neither re-writing nor comment: "Crazed by religious study, Leonard Holler, 35 years old, of 381 Howe avenue, Passaic, N. J., awoke early yesterday and tried, by force, to baptize his seven-year-old daughter with ice cold water. The police were called and he fought them. In headquarters he became violent, stripped off all his clothing and gave the police a terrific battle before he was overcome. Later he was dressed and placed in a padded cell at the county jail. Holler was a constant visitor at the recent six weeks' revival held by the Protestant churches of Passaic and at which the Rev. Frank Hall Wright, the famous Indian evangelist, was the preacher. He gave up much of his time to reading religious pamphlets and the strain turned his mind."

The income of America's foremost clergyman, now serving in Boston, has been more than four hundred thousand dollars in the past four years. This has made him rich, but the Bible says it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Consideration of this point led Mr. J. D. Williams of Boston to inaugurate a movement to save the wealthy divine's soul; and it is this: "Let all his friends and well-wishers join in helping to save him from eternal damnation by a simple method; namely, stop making any further contribution to his hoard of money." The Boston police worked against the plan to save the evangelist's soul by arresting Mr. Williams.

An appropriate rebuke is administered by the New York Nation to the publishers of "The Mythology of All Races," who in announcing the work avow the intention to admit nothing "offensive to pious ears." The Nation says: "We are tempted to retort that if any ears are offended by hearing the whole truth concerning the substrata of religion, art, and poetry—for such myths are—so much the worse for the owners of such tender members. Modification and excision may well be practiced in books intended for children, but timidity in a work which pretends to be scientific is past all excusing." The Nation is right. With pious ears for judges, the truth will always be suppressed.

This age lacks truth. People seem to be afraid of it. Men and women don't speak truth, don't sing truth, don't pray truth. Lies are on top. Lies have the inning. Let a minister preach truth, and in five minutes he would have only his own ears listening to his voice. His congregation would be outside the church calling the preacher a fool, or crazy. No one wants truth. Everybody wants money. And the people think one can get money by lying better than by telling the truth. There you have it.

The intended kindness of those persons who in response to "many requests" have sent Catholic literature to the Catholic soldiers at the Mexican border is unappreciated by the recipients. Correspondents known to the Monitor, a Catholic newspaper published in San Francisco, "declare that packages of reading matter often remain unopened in some of the camps." It is conceded that Catholics are not readers, which may explain why they remain Catholics.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly and promptly made.

"TRAIL-HITTING" A JOKE.

From J. L. Vondel, Massachusetts.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The greatest farce ever acted in Boston is that after-piece entitled "Hitting the Trail," now being given thirteen times weekly at the big shed on the old circus grounds after the hippodrome performances of the Barnum of religion—Dr. Bill Sunday. Last night (Dec. 16, the twenty-first day of trail-hitting) brought the total of CON-verts up to 25,548, compared with Philadelphia's 12,069 for the same time. This proves that New England is not cold, but right there with the "glad hand."

Boston beats the record. But I think if the truth were known, there have been much larger percentages of genuine "hitting" in many of those smaller places in the West where the acrobatic evangelist played before he struck the "big time."

This part of the show began the middle of the second week, after interest had been worked up in the press by statements that not even Billy Sunday knew when the trail would be opened. Then came a special, prearranged night when most of the seats were reserved for Bible classes of Boston and suburbs. Several large delegations marched up with brass bands. When Bill gave the "high sign" some 300 members of a local Bible class jumped up and raced down the aisle through the fire-proofed shavings. And the game kept up until over 1,400 had shaken his hand. This smashed all first-night records to smithereens. Oh! there's nothing small about us greater Bostonians! But the score could just as easily have been twice as large, if the management had wished. Sure, it was a "plant."

Sunday calls on all church members to come down and be reconsecrated, and one of his supporters at the Newton Theological Seminary admits that 90 per cent. of the "trailers" are church members. Others are curiosity seekers, and I seriously doubt if one per cent. of those signing cards are genuine converts.

A few afternoons ago Sunday must have had a twinge of shame, or was disgusted at the utter hypocrisy of it all, for after shaking several hundred hands he shouted: "Come forward for the Lord, and not to shake hands with me only." Then, as the persons approaching seemed still to be of reception variety, Sunday slammed down his trapdoor and called off the trail-hitting. Oh! what a farce it all is! And how the church boobs do fall for it! The other afternoon "Rody" called for a show of hands from all those who had come for the first time. And there were very few. Hundreds of good women are enjoying regular afternoon revival jags.

I went the other evening with a delegation from a Boston daily. We had good seats from which to hear and see "when Christ comes to Boston." Alas! it was quite tame—this expurgated Sunday. The sermon, judged by orthodox standards, is one of his best, but was ruined by atrocious delivery. He yowled and yammered, gyrated, stood on one foot and did almost impossible acrobatic stunts at the tamest parts of his sermon, and then—fell flat where an orator would have made his greatest hits.

And the trail-hitting? Just another such affair as the governor's annual reception to the public at the State House on Washington's Birthday. No penitential tears, none of the old revival scenes of my boyhood days—just smiling, amused faces and handshakes! Just fake converts to "con" the public and bring fresh crowds from far-away places. Cheap hypocrisy!

PRACTICAL SPIRITUALISM.

From J. R. Perry, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I wish to make a few suggestions and observations in reply to the article by Channing Severance, called "Live-Forever Stuff" (Dec. 9, 1916).

The article is one to make a thoughtful person stir, and awakens a desire to say something on the most important and interesting question of life and death and what follows. To say, as many of our most learned and advanced scientists have said, "I have no interest in the subject of immortality, or the revelations of modern Spiritualism; I consider them all as the results of pleasant dreams, delusions or deceptions," is very unsatisfactory, and simply shows that they thereby acknowledge their inability to solve the presentations of Spiritualism; they ignore its phenomena for the safer side of the question, and so sustain their reputations as the leaders of modern scientific thought. They are afraid also that a thorough study of the subject might result in their becoming believers in this very unpopular subject of immortality, as so many of the foremost of their class have become its avowed advocates.

It has been forced upon my mind that a professional scientist, who confines his whole mind to investigations on the plane of material substances, and who endeavors to solve the problem of the life of matter by creating matter forms from various chemical substances, as Professor Loeb and others are doing, are wasting much valuable time as to that point of inquiry. Such experiments have been of great use in discovering things to aid in the medical profession; but the cause of life, no doubt, will ever remain an undiscovered riddle of the universe. The cause or causes of life are infinite, and therefore to comprehend this infinitude of causation would require an equal infinite capacity, to which no one need aspire, as to solve any question in any department of nature one must be equal in intelligence to the question under consideration.

The subject of a future life, however, is a subject within the scope of human observation and intelligence, and must be determined mainly upon the intelligence to be derived from such sources as claim to come from that unseen world.

The psychical society of Europe, with such men as Professor Crookes to investigate the subject, has done much to call attention to modern Spiritualism and give it character, at least among thinkers. When they observed musical instruments floating around the room in a light of sufficient quantity to be plainly seen, and heard well-known tunes played upon them, and when any other tunes were played at the request of the beholders, and often at the silent request of some one in the room, it became a question, not so much as to the fact of such observations of the flying and playing accordion, but of that private intelligence that could see or feel the desire of some person's mental request for a certain piece of music, and respond to that request. This phase naturally suggested a human thought and intelligence connected with such musical performance. The manipulation of an instrument required intelligence, but when one's secret thoughts could be read and responded to, it required a captious critic to doubt the claim of the spirit and its human characteristics. Here was something that could not only use some unseen force to play upon accordions and guitars, but it could see the workings of the human brains of those composing the circle of attendants. Then again, when Home, the medium, a man weighing about 140 pounds, was drawn up and floated over the heads of the party, and at one time, under a test arrangement, taken from the circle formed in one room, and floated out of the window of that room over a pavement high enough from it, if dropped, to kill him, and taken safely into an adjoining room, where the sub-committee awaited his arrival, that performance required something more than the unconscious operations of nature's forces to explain it. The intelligence manifested through such a performance pointed directly to an unseen, intelligent use of forces, just as much as when a seen intelligence, such as man, uses and controls any force or forces in nature, such as electricity, heat, light, gravity, etc., to aid him to run a locomotive or send out a wave of electrical force, and talk through the ether of space to his fellow-man.

The anti-spiritualists have been hoping and praying and waiting, oh, so patiently, for the last sixty-odd years, that some unseen force in nature would be discovered to solve the question, but alas! all in vain. Not so much as the making of one rap, or the movement of one chair, or table, or anything else, has been discovered to give us one iota of intelligence from the unconscious forces of nature, except in connection with the intelligence of man or spirit man. I have seen a chair start off and walk about the room in broad daylight, with the sun shining into the room. This article of common furniture would act just as intelligently by the unseen force using it as any person seen could act and move it. It would go to any place requested, or do anything that a man could do with a chair; or if no special request was made, it would come and bump up against the sitter, seemingly to ask him to a closer observation of the mind it was manifesting.

In the Phelps house in Connecticut, about the time of the first rapping at Hydesville through the Fox sisters, a much more remarkable phase occurred. Phelps was an orthodox preacher or deacon in a church, and bitterly opposed to the idea of spirits, but called it the work of the devil. His son seemed to be the one through whom the spirit forces operated. They would move the breakfast table, and often upset their coffee or other parts of the meal, and the more Mr. Phelps objected and scolded them as wicked devils, the more pranks they would play upon the family. When the matter became too annoying for longer endurance, he at last called in his neighbors, and in this way many hundreds of people witnessed the manifestations, all of which are matters of history. They would write messages on slips of paper and drop them from the ceiling upon the table while at their meals, and when Mr. Phelps called them hard names, such as wicked imps, etc., the replies would fall from the ceiling, usually calling him an old fool or bigot, and sometimes they would be signed by the name of a deceased relative, pleading, as it were, to have the family pay a truthful attention to the subject. On several occasions they would drop their scraps of paper on his plate and those were signed "Devil" in large letters. When he sent his medium boy away to school, to get rid of them, the spirit forces followed him, and to make him return home they tore his clothing, ripped his cap to pieces, and the like, and compelled the boy to return. One of the pranks they often played was to take the clothes of some of the family and fill them out in such a way that pantaloons, shirts and ladies' skirts would stand up upon the floor; and when a goodly number of their neighbors called in to see the performance, the various articles so supported would suddenly drop to the floor in a limp mass. Articles of all kinds were carried, and sometimes thrown with great force, so as to break them into fragments. This continued for more than three years, and at last, when Phelps and his family became more reasonable and less bigoted in their opinions in reference to spirits, they left his home and the worriment ceased. How they got the slips of paper into the room through closed doors, or how those intelligent messages and replies were made so promptly and on the occasions, were unaccountable and remain an unexplained mystery. That they occurred is a fact too well supported by reliable testimony to be doubted.

I might recite hundreds and thousands of similar cases that have occurred since 1848 in all parts of the world, and yet with all this historical and personal living evidence of an intelligent commerce now existing between the natural and spiritual worlds, Monism and scientific Materialism waves its uplifted hands and brushes all this evidence aside as a delusion and pleasant dreams; but with all this the ghost will not down.

As Mr. Severance says, "Man enters into his present existence by means of two germ cells, microscopical in size, and he is composed of six elemental substances, hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen, carbon, sulphur and phosphorus, and from these invisible specks we grow into active physical bodies and develop mind and, above all, consciousness." There follow the silent making of a pair of eyes, that eventually are to take in the objects of physical nature and inform us of an objective world, the making of a pair of ears that will be made to receive the vibrations of space outside of ourselves; the nerves of smell and taste to corroborate the first named senses, and yet still more important a sense of feeling permeating the whole organism, a sensitive inhabitant, so to speak, that has his nerve cells reaching to every part of this wonderful organic structure, a sort of ghost man, that unites all the other cells into one of sensation and consciousness, and by which means the animal acquires the ability to see, hear, feel, taste, smell and remember, in accordance to the perfection of the whole organic structure. How wonderful! And yet while nature has done all this from two small specks of matter forms, when we leave the physical organism at death, we are inclined to believe that all her powers of construction have ceased, and although she has a hundred or so pounds of bones, tendons, muscles, nerves and a man ghost sleeping within this mass, she is unable to wake him up into a conscious being of more refined organic form and having the functions of such a life as he enjoyed before death took place.

To one who has had the experience of the writer, such a view seems to show little respect for nature's powers, and with my experience and its evidences of a future life, I care not for the reputations of great men who have not examined the subject and will not do so. I for one will not believe that death ends all, and I am neither afraid nor ashamed to say so.

CHRISTIANITY AND MORALITY.

From E. J. Hoffpauir, Texas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It must be delightfully refreshing to the tired listener for a minister of the gospel to forget the nature of his calling so far as to tell the plain unvarnished truth about the relationship of Christianity and morals.

Such an incident (if we are to credit press reports) occurred recently in Beaumont, Tex., when Rev. D. W. Moore declared in a sermon (text from Heb. ii, 3-4) that "morality is not Christianity and has nothing to do with it."

We are grateful to Mr. Moore for the statement, and could wish that he stood higher in the councils of the church. And were not the franchise denied us, we would vote to make him a bishop.

During our childhood we were taught that Christianity alone was responsible for all recognized moral law; that without the influence of Christianity all knowledge of morality would perish from the earth. We have heard this doctrine repeatedly taught in the Sunday schools of today. Smooth-tongued politicians and other petty grafters of all varieties are fond of repeating stale and unprofitable platitudes to the effect that morality and Christianity are inseparable. Men in the ordinary walks of life, as well as those higher up, who have had the benefit of the customary college instruction in dead languages and dead ideas, are positive that morality and Christianity are one and the same. To the great majority the interdependence of the two has never been questioned. And to all those came the Rev. Mr. Moore's preaching that "morality is not Christianity and has nothing to do with it," as a revolutionary flash from the strongholds of conservatism.

Those of the congregation who were not asleep must have felt the presence of the evil one.

But while it is our purpose to welcome gladly all such heretical statements as that of Rev. Mr. Moore, we are inclined to class it as but a half-truth after all. Christianity does have something to do with the morality of today. If not directly, then indirectly, for the moral standards of today, with very few exceptions, are in line with the best interests of the capitalist class, and Christianity is one of the ever faithful props of the capitalist system.

Christianity, and especially that part of it represented by the Catholic church, is looked upon by some of the conservative element of society as a bulwark of defense against the inroads of Socialism. And it certainly is a weighty factor, though for pure and unadulterated misrepresentation and falsehood, the palm must be handed to its contemporary prostitute—the press.

Such statements are also valuable as indicating the progress of evolution in religious thought, and is further confirmation of the statement that Christianity is fast whittling away its base.

As for Rev. Mr. Moore, he may be called on to retract or recant. Surely such heretical statements will not be allowed to go unchallenged by those whom God in all his wisdom has appointed to watch over his flock.

However, it may be all a mistake of the reporter. We are all acquainted with the highly developed "lack of accuracy" possessed by the average newspaper reporter.

QUIZZING A "HARMONIZER."

From J. B. Herriman, Iowa.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In the 11th of October issue of the Des Moines Register and Leader, Mr. J. M. McGaughey of Chariton, contended that there was no conflict between Science and Genesis. I should be pleased if he would answer a few questions. According to the Bible story, the earth was the first planet in existence, and before this earth was created there could have been nothing but unlimited space where God and his angels dwelt without any place to dwell on or light to see by; when all at once it occurred to him not only to create the earth, but millions of other worlds, some of which are so much larger than the earth that it would be like a baseball in comparison to our globe.

After spending three days or longer periods in creating the earth, he created the sun, moon and millions of stars, all in one day or period, and all these were made out of nothing. After he had made the sun to rule the day, it seems it did not enter on its duty at once, as, according to his theory, the periods still continued. Perhaps God had not started the earth to revolving yet.

Since it has been determined that the days mentioned in the creative story were not days but long periods, why has the Bible not been changed to read accordingly? And when did the long period leave off and the day begin? Was the seventh day as long as the other six, and did God rest a day or a long period?

Did not the appearance of the sun have an effect on the length of the day? When the geologists made the discovery that the world was millions of years old instead of 6,000, every priest and preacher pounded his pulpit and vehemently proclaimed the idea the work of the devil and advised his hearers not to believe it, and any one who should have been so bold as to change the reading of the Bible three hundred years ago would have been tortured by some of the various means they had for disciplining heretics at that time.

Why did not the clergy discover that the days meant long periods before the scientists did? The theory has been invented since to save the absurd Bible story of creation. I would like to know if it agrees with science that the earth was the first planet in existence, or that grass, fruit and herbs will grow without the light of the sun.

Other nations had a similar creative story long before Moses was thought of. How could anything be a revelation that was known before? What good will it do anyone to believe the Bible story of creation, and what harm for a man not to believe it? And what good substantial reason is there for believing it?

I sent this letter to the Register, but if it has appeared I have missed it. Our side of the question seldom gets a hearing.

A TELLING CIRCULAR.

From Aurora Thunder, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I notice with pleasure that some of our Rationalist societies are taking up a hand-to-hand fight with these money-grabbing evangelists, in the endeavor to convince their dupes how they are being fleeced in having their attention drawn away from really important matters of life by this ill-smelling bloater drawn across the trail.

The difficulty as it occurs to me is, how to make these people read what we have to say in our handbills, etc., for all Rational arguments are lost on such credulous persons. Such literature should bear some such form as is adopted with the same class of readers in the daily paper advertisements—just gall them into reading it, and leave it to work its own end by speaking for itself without comment. I have sketched a short handbill with a heading that will catch these troglodytes, and can imagine them attracted to the wall 3-sheet by the heading, and reading on with folded hands and a "bless-the-dear-man" expression, until they come to the eye-opener, which may probably have more effect than all the criticisms of their doctrines and methods.

FAITH IN THE BIBLE.

From Francis Flint, Washington.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am enclosing a clipping from a daily newspaper which I thought might be of interest to yourself and other Freethinkers. We have our share of Bible fanatics and pulpit pounders out here. One "brother" of the Seventh Day Adventist flock says that quails are made out of whales, and that a man from another planet lived on our globe. One day he showed me a picture of the "Little Horn of Daniel," and when I asked him if he had a picture of the Big Horn of Daniel he became angry and said: "There ain't no big horn." The same follower of the "lamb" threatened to lay a neighbor in the cemetery. He raved about health and sanitation, but turned the pages of the scriptures with his wet thumb—a practice not overly sanitary.

In the trials and disappointments of life I have always found Freethought a refuge in the time of storm.

MULTUM IN PARVO.

From A. M., New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

According to "The Bible in New York," published quarterly at 66 Bible House, "the Bible is a lamp and a light. The Bible is a mirror. The Bible is food. The Bible is a sword. The Bible is a fire and a hammer. The Bible is as silver, as gold and honey. The Bible is seed." That being true, it must be the most compact kit ever sent to the trenches abroad. It has always been famous for stopping bullets and can undoubtedly be used as a tooth brush, shaving soap, etc. They do not claim that the Bible is truth, nor peace, nor morality, but they have distributed 320,715 copies in the past year.

A FIREMAN'S RELIGION.

From Jack Boren, Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I have often been asked by Christians, or rather professing Christians, as to whether or not all men who were members of a fire department believed as I do in regard to religion.

In reply I will have to say no, although I have seen a good many Freethinkers in the fire service.

There are many who are Agnostics inwardly, but who outwardly are neutral. Like men in other walks of life, those who claim to be Christians merely say so because they have become imbued with the popular idea that Christianity stands for all that is pure and good.

The fireman is not a Christian; he is too good a man for that.

Believers retire at night to their warm beds and ask God to protect their lives and their property. But in the dead hours of night, when the lurid flames are seen creeping nearer and nearer, they forsake the gods and call the fire department.

On the other hand, the fireman, climbing amidst the crashing roar of falling timbers, his face pressed against the icy check of death, and almost overcome with smoke and heat, wonders not of God, but is the ladder safe.

Again I say, no! the fireman is not a Christian. He is not concerned with the hereafter, but with the present. His religion is to do good, to save property, and to save lives. Whenever a fireman is approached by a minister who thinks perhaps that firemen are a lost body of men, the fireman generally smiles a broad, good-natured, manly smile, and says: "No, I think that I will not have to fight any fires in the next world (if there is any); I am doing my share now."

A PROMISED NOTABLE THESIS.

From Dr. L. R. G. Crandon, Boston.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I thank you for your live, honest, fearless paper. Easy-going Americans are in constant danger of being overwhelmed by insidious, selfish Christianity. Some day I am going before Harvard College faculty for a Ph.D. on the thesis: "Christianity, the Burden and Curse of the World!"

OBITUARY.

Funeral services were held at her late home, 75 Monitor street, on Thursday, December 21, Mr. Franklin Steiner officiating. The sympathy of all goes out to her husband and the mother, who survive her.

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Lucretia Mott, Jan. 3, 1793-Nov. 11, 1880.

This noble woman, one of the best known reformers of her day, was born in Nantucket, Massachusetts, January 3, 1793. She was born of Quaker stock, her maiden name being Lucretia Coffin. On her mother's side she was descended from Peter Folger, grandfather of Benjamin Franklin. Hence she came from the best American ancestry. In early life she became a teacher, and while engaged in this capacity was, in 1811, married to James Mott, like herself of the Quaker persuasion. About this time there was a split in this peculiar sect. The Liberal element separated from the orthodox wing under the leadership of Elias Hicks, a brother of Willet Hicks, known as a staunch friend of Thomas Paine in the author-hero's latter days. Both Mr. and Mrs. Mott identified themselves with the Liberal element, and Mrs. Mott was given a license to preach. Both became workers in the anti-slavery cause, and made lecture tours together as far west as Indiana and as far south as Virginia and Maryland. Mr. Mott gave up a large cotton brokerage business in Philadelphia because he refused to profit by the labor of slaves. In 1840 Mrs. Mott took up the cause of woman's rights. That year she first met Elizabeth Cady Stanton in London. Later, with Mrs. Stanton, she called the Seneca Falls convention "to discuss the social, civil and religious condition of the rights of women." In 1848 she and Mrs. Stanton addressed the anti-Sabbath convention in Boston, both being opposed to the Puritanical Sunday laws of the time. Mr. Mott died in Brooklyn, Jan. 26, 1868. Mrs. Mott, after a marvelous life of good deeds, died at the age of eighty-seven, in Philadelphia, Nov. 11, 1880. Samuel P. Putnam says (Four Hundred Years of Freethought, p. 493):

"Lucretia Mott blooms like a lily with its 'heart of fire.' What a force was concentrated in that gentle womanhood! Man might think he could crush that frail body, but it was stronger than his cannon. Simple, plain, unobtrusive, soft voiced, from her silvery speech what lightnings flamed against the old obstructions!"

Good Books.

Cultivated men and women have always good books among their most valued possessions, and one cannot believe that this taste can be sacrificed without definite loss to our civilization.

The spoken word can never supplant the written word and in fact the present tendency is all toward substituting print for speech. Nor can reading in public places take the place of reading one's own books in the quiet of one's home. Books that are owned wait patiently on the reader's leisure; and to have just the book one wants when one wants it must remain one of the supreme luxuries of a cultivated life.

Books, too, when personally owned, writes Earl Barnes in the Atlantic, gather around themselves a wealth of personal associations. The very binding, paper and title page recall the conditions under which the book came into our possession. As we open its pages we remember the last time we read it, the place and circumstances, and the people with whom we discussed it. Books have personality; and they must always remain the warm friends of their possessors.

Togo as Santa.

In the English which his author, Wallace Irwin, has invented for him, Hashimura Togo, the "Japanese schoolboy," confesses the failure he made trying to play Santa Claus. He worked for Mrs. and Mr. J. Poke, Rockpile, N. J. The children were Hester and Lester, aged 5 and 7, respectively. They were skeptical about Santa Claus as a real person, and on request of their parents he set out to convince them of their mistake. This is how he did it (as related to the Evening Sun):

On date previously before Xmas I go to town village with weekly salary, price $5, and purchase considerable wheel cart, squeak-doll, jump-up-Jack, and other childish amusements. These I poke under overcoat and retreat home slyly like snails walking over upholstery.

When nighttime was there, Hon. Hester & Lester was cruelly sent to bedtime and locked asleep so they would not find out about Hon. St. Claus. As soon as they make sleep, Mrs. & Mr. Poke command me for bring forth Xmas tree. I make him grow from soap box in dining room. I assist intelligently hanging this foliage with tin fruit, including numerous candles standing on limbs to resemble fireworks. While Hon. Poke boss my enthusiasm, I fetch forth considerable heavy toy boxes from basement of cellar. Back broke feelings by me. Yet I continue this labors until mixed assortment of Xmas stood by tree with deceptive labels about Hon. St. Claus.

At 1 o'clock hour A. M. Mrs. and Mr. retire bedward, exhausted from observing my work. But my dutiful labors had just commence. I must prepare to show these childish children how Hon. Mr. Claus downslide down chimbley-pipe.

All house was full of darkness. Frozen moonlight outside. With sneekret footsteps, like snakes swimming in oil, I approach to closet and fetch forth following articles of clothes:

- 1 minkish ottomobile coat
- 2 boots of rubberly exterior
- 1 cap from Eskimo leather
- ½ lb. cotton resembling whisker.

I drop all them presents I bought inside one laundry-bag, place myself into those garments of clothes, then with detective toes I descend up through attic to where chimbley-pipe was on roof.

4 o'clock time now approach. Making affectionate hugs to Hon. Chimbley, I could tell it was Xmas by the feel of the thermometer. By peeking down Hon. Chimbley, I could see how it was sufficiently large hole to permit my Japanese smallness—yet I must compress myself to do so. I enjoyed considerable nervousness like heroes expecting to dive down Mt. Vesuvius.

Pretty soonly 6 a. m. was there and I was not yet froze completely hard. By listening down chimbley-pipe with telephone expression, I could hear childhood voices coming down stairs saying "Oh!!" It were time for me to make some slide.

I pull ½ lb. cotton to my chin, snuggle Hon. Bag to back, and commence climbing into chimbley. What was? Distinctly I could smell slight smudj of smoke coming upwards! Yet it were too late. Already I was slipping, down-sliding slowly. Great chokes enjoyed. When nearly down I stuck up suddenly. More chokes.

"Oh, hellup, hellup!" I gollup.

"Who's there?" demanded Hon. Poke below-down.

"Hon. St. Claus containing smoke!" I yellup. "Make haste or else be quick!"

Some individual persons grabb me at toes. With intense drag I was pulled forth to fireplace where blazes was. My cottonly whisker become inflamed, and in desperado attempt I clash against Xmas-tree which tottle over amidst horrible fire-alarms. Great holla by all. Then I am a hero, as usual. While all others make hook-and-ladder noise, I embrace Hon. Tree with elbows, and reject him outwards through window. Of finally all was silent, except slight smell of smudj.

"What impossibility are you attempting to act like?" require Hon. Mrs. sarcastly.

"Hon. St. Claus," I report.

"Why you no entrance by door?" shreech Hon. Mr. with wounded knuckle.

"Doors is not respectable for Saints to come in by," I devote.

"They are plenty for Japanese to go out by," resnort him, escorting me outwards with brutal jam.

And when I was deploying away from there I hear Hester & Lester report in voice together:

"We have saw Hon. St. Claus. We do not care to meet such a person!"

So I depart off feeling like an impossibility.

The Buffalo Herd.

The government's herd of buffalo on the Wichita National Forest, in Oklahoma, which is also a federal game preserve, was lately increased by the arrival of ten calves, according to a report received by the Forest Service from the supervisor in charge. The herd, which now comprises sixty-two specimens of the almost extinct bison, is in good condition, says the supervisor, and promises to continue increasing at a rapid rate.

Eight of the calves are females, bringing the number of heifers and cows up to thirty. The bulls number thirty-two and have been placed by themselves in a pasture fenced in for them.

Three years ago the buffalo herd on the Wichita Forest was little more than half as large as it is now. It is said that the other game animals in the preserve, including the elk and antelope, also are increasing, due to the protection afforded, not only against hunters, but against wolves, wildcats, and other predatory animals, which committed serious depredations from the establishment of the preserve in 1905 until measures were taken to stop them. In protecting the game from predatory animals, the wardens and forest officers are also promoting the interests of local stockmen, who graze several thousand head of cattle on certain allotted areas within the preserve.

This Happened in Ireland.

A shrewd manager in one of Ireland's stores was recently "downed" by a raw junior clerk of unexpected prevision.

The clerk had completed a sale to a lady who had purchased shoes, value 21s. 2d. On opening her purse, she found she had only 16s. 2d. to pay for them. "Never mind," she said, "I'll take the shoes and pay the 5s. balance tomorrow."

The clerk took her money and made up her parcel, and away she went.

Now advances the all-seeing manager, like a destroying angel. "Why!" shouted he, "she may never come back!"

"Oh, won't she!" said the clerk. "Of course she'll come back. Shure, I've given her two rights."

Cutting.

To the great relief of the neighbors, the snobbish and unpopular Jones family were moving. While the furniture was being brought out some difficulty was experienced in removing a pianoforte from an upper room, and some one proposed getting it through a large window and sliding it down. Then came a suggestion from the Jones's next-door neighbor, who had long fostered the deepest enmity toward them, though until now she had attempted to conceal it. "No," she said acidly, all her pent-up bitterness at last showing itself in her tone, "let it come out as it went in—on the instalment system!"

The Efficiency of Lightning.

Enos Mills, conservationist and author of many well-known books on western America, tells a story of how a pioneer settled an old discussion. We get it from the Continent.

"One day in the mountains of Montana I took refuge with a pioneer. It was a rainy day. At last the storm was breaking but the lightning frequently struck here or there. We were standing in the open door of his house when suddenly the lightning struck a tree nearby. So terrific was the bolt that the tree appeared to have been suddenly dynamited.

"That brought to my mind an old discussion of why lightning never strikes twice in the same place. So I turned to this old pioneer and asked, 'Why is it, Jerry, that lightning never strikes twice in the same place?'

"'Gosh, it don't need to!' was the prompt reply."

Precautions.

Grown old in the service of his master and mistress, James was a privileged retainer.

He was waiting at table one day, when a guest asked for a fish-fork, but the request was ignored.

Then the hostess noticed the episode, and remarked, in a most peremptory manner:

"James, Mrs. Jones hasn't any fish-fork. Get her one at once!"

"Madam," came the emphatic reply, "last time Mrs. Jones dined here we lost a fish-fork."

The Imagination.

It was at the movies. An old couple sat together through a picture that included many views of the Wild West. In one of these a cattle "round-up" appeared, in which the dust rose in clouds from the parched ground.

The old lady began to cough, and finally, when the neighbors began to fidget, her husband nudged her with his elbow:

"Don't cough, Annie; can't you see you're disturbing the other folks?"

His wife looked at him apologetically over her handkerchief, smothering a spasm. "I can't help it, Ephraim. The dust tickles my throat!"

All Right.

Teacher—"Now, boys, I want to see if any of you can make a complete sentence out of two words, both having the same sound to the ear."

First Boy—"I can, Miss Smith."

Teacher—"Very well, Robert. Let us hear your sentence."

First Boy—"Write right."

Teacher—"Very good."

Second Boy—"Miss Smith, I can beat that. I can make three words of it—Wright, write right."

Third Boy (excitedly)—"Hear this—Wright, write rite right."—Tit-Bits.

Wisely Warned.

"Yes, sir," said the station-master, "Safety First has spread all over this country. And nobody that comes to Beaver Hill will ever get in no accidents fer want o' warnin' signs about. Jest look at that now."

The stranger gazed appreciatively at the sign nailed on a near-by telegraph-post. Its stern message was:

"It is dangerous to walk or stand on these tracks while a train is passing."

Failures.

"How are the incubators getting along?" asked a friend of his neighbor who had recently bought some.

"Why, all right, I suppose; but although I have had them for two weeks now, not one of the four has laid an egg yet."—Ladies Home Journal.

THE LETTER BOX.

R. D. TOMPKINS, Detroit, Mich.—Your "Revelation" does not recommend itself here as in line with our work. Personal revelations, whether received at Patmos or Detroit, are a sign there is a screw loose somewhere.

R. D. KARSNER, New Jersey.—You say in the published chapter of your forthcoming book on Horace Traubel that H. T. is in the habit of writing notes of endearment in his own hand to "little children who do not yet know the alphabet." Do you think that if they preserve these mementoes until they have learned the alphabet it will help them any in reading H. T.'s notes?

S. ATKINSON, En Route.—No Rationalists we know of are holding the thought that religious pictures should be censored off the screen. We regard these pictures as a concession to religion by the movie men, who hope they will help the other kind of pictures to get by on Sunday, or that they will mollify the censors. These religious exhibitions are the dreariest spectacles that could be presented or imagined, and the proper way to censor them is to go where they are not.

H. R. W., Cambridge, Mass.—The evangelist's continued attacks on Ingersoll after having confessed that he never read a word of him only emphasizes his lack of civility. He probably never read Paine either—never read anything but the things he steals to pad his copyrighted sermons. The method of the religious critic is easier than that of the literary reviewer. The latter is compelled to peruse the work he is to refute, while the Infidel smasher assails the character and motives of the author.

A. M., New York.—That rider to the postoffice appropriation bill proposing to put newspapers and magazines into the parcel post and charge for postage according to the "zone" has no friends among the general public nor among the readers of the publications that will be affected. It is only necessary to convince congressmen of this fact, and that their support of the measure will be resented, in order to accomplish the defeat of the foolish scheme. Your notification that you will send a protest to your congressman sets the right example, and the first one.

NOVA SCOTIAN.—While an order was issued many years ago for the exclusion of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the Canadian mails, it has not proved generally operative, and Canadian subscribers have received the paper quite as regularly as subscribers elsewhere. The publication of Haeckel's "Eternity" in book form would hardly act against the admission of THE TRUTH SEEKER unless all the publications of the concern have been prohibited by the Dominion government. The holiday gorging of the mails has broken up the regularity of newspaper dispatching and delivery.

PROPAGANDIST, California.—To be sure, the notion that a Rationalist lecturer ought to confine himself to expounding Rationalism, is questioned, but we have always held to it as an ideal. It looks easy of accomplishment, because a broadly educated speaker can make the topic of Freethought cover a great variety of subordinate themes. Besides the field of religious criticism, the whole domain of science is open to him. He can deal with the various aspects of evolution, which gives him opportunity to contrast facts with the dogmas of irrational belief. The principles of the freedom of press, of speech and of the mails have always been associated with those of Freethought. A wide subject for study and discussion is the relation of government to morals, or the customs which have been crystallized as such. This is susceptible of perpetual debate, because it can never be settled. Having brought all things to the touchstone of Rationalism, the lecturer may review them in their relation to the good of humanity and all the earth. If Moses Oppenheimer can see that all subjects are but branches of Socialism; if George Rusby can make a universal application of the Singletax, and if Dr. Robinson, as a birth controller, can discuss everything without departing from that fundamental concept, surely the Free-thinker, who knows that the church is defective in sociology, economics and morals, can keep to his subject with any of them.

THE SERVICE OF MAN

By JAMES COTTER MORISON

This is a book of peculiar interest, written by a man of striking personality. The object of the book is to show how the Service of God, or of Gods, leads by natural evolution to the Service of Man; from Theolatriy to Anthropolatriy. Mention of some of the chapter headings will show the attractive nature of the work. Chapter II deals with "The Decay of Belief"; Chapter IV with "The Alleged Consolations of the Christian Religion"; Chapter VI is named "Morality in the Ages of Faith"; and in the VIIth chapter there is recorded "What Christianity Has Done." There are in all nine chapters of clear and accurate reasoning in favor of the glorification of man over a decadent laudation of gods. The book is framed in an admirable spirit, and exhibits on every page the generous nature and lively vivacity of its author. It is invaluable to the student of Rationalism, especially if he be called upon to "give a reason for the faith that is in him."

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century
By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

The High Cost of Living.

There seems to be no end to the reasons advanced to account for the continual increase in the cost of things, and after recounting all the various reasons, the writers usually end by saying in effect that they don't know what the reasons are, but that the condition is world-wide.

Now the reader must be prepared to find in these remarks a conglomeration of "fallacies" and "illogical conclusions," but it has always been my way to get things straightened out for my own satisfaction, to give more attention to the element of human nature than to the economic laws laid down by some thinker or philosopher who lived about the year two.

Sometimes a trifling thing which no one takes note of may lead to far-reaching results; out of certain foolish statements that I have observed, I have my own idea about the continual increase in the cost of living.

One reason that has caused it is the increasing tendency of the wives of the nation to draw a salary from their husbands. That sounds foolish, but they are doing it. My grandmother used to spin the cloth from which the family clothes were made. Thousands of other grandmothers did the same. They also made the candle and the wick and the soap and they made the meal and corned the beef and salted the pork and filled the cellar and the pantry with preserves and the garret with dried fruits and other eatables.

Every year sees more and more of these employments handed over to the factory, and as our mothers and daughters grow more fastidious, these things come out in more tempting and expensive packages; and everything that the wife buys ready made to eat or wear is a direct drain on the husband's pocket, or his labor, and in effect it is but transferring to him the labor of preparing the food and the clothing for the family while wifery wears herself out in social functions. In plain language, every job which grandmother did is now shifted upon her grandson. All these tempting and fancy packages add to the cost of the goods.

Gradually the family has come to depend upon the doctor for every little ailment, and the doctors under the appearance of protecting the public health are gradually building up with the aid of the "secular arm" as tight a little priesthood of doping as ever Romanism developed in regard to matters of the soul. Nobody wants a shabby doctor. He doesn't look as if he knew anything, and doctor doesn't want to look that way. The result is the people spend about as much a month for the doctor's guesses as they formerly paid for the priest's prayers.

There are thousands of homes in this country where the people, especially the women, worship at the shrine of the upright piano. Women break down their health rubbing clothes upon grandmother's washboard in order to pay for the piano which stands in silent majesty in the best room except when some misguided person tries to draw from it some alleged music.

Once installed, that piano calls for congenial surroundings, and when the new furniture and rugs are installed, a more "refined" idea of living is in order.

But chief among the causes of the increase in the cost of living not traced to these sources, started its operation probably twenty-five years ago: I mean the stock company. The stock company or corporation sets out to do business by corraling various small amounts into a capital fund. In order to stimulate the collecting of the fund, dividends are promised, and the bigger the dividend the faster the fund grows. Once the dividends are promised they must be delivered, and the courts of law are depositories of the various expedients that fertile minds have invented to produce something from nothing.

How much water the people of this country pay for in every purchase it is impossible to tell; but when Cleveland's street car was started, it proved that the people in that city were paying dividends on $11,000,000 worth of "capital" which did not exist.

Once this stock company, dividends-idea got started, everything from a grand trunk railroad to a peanut stand got into it, and the money to pay dividends had to come from somewhere, and the easiest place to get it was from the ultimate consumer in the shape of increased price. "Short crops" and famines, insects and mice—anything for an excuse for the high price. Once the price was up, it never came down—unless in the shape of a smaller package.

Those people who claim that the increase in wages causes the increase in price are mistaken, for wages are not advanced voluntarily, as a rule, but after a demand, a threat, or a strike. Then the price goes up to offset it.

Then the railroad, the telephone and telegraph have facilitated the organization of big combines, which get a corner on almost everything in which they deal, and unless the little fellows follow their lead, the big fellow squeezes them out either directly or indirectly.

Inventions are grabbed up by big capital and make for monopoly, and breed a tribe of middlemen who live off the ultimate consumer besides increasing production, reducing costs and letting out superfluous help which must compete for jobs in a restricted labor market because of the land monopoly.

Immigration adds its millions to this struggling mass, and tends to keep wages down, while the helplessness of the women to do their part as producers for the family, and the man's helplessness as regards independent effort makes the family the prey of the industrial order whose heart and soul is profit.

The cold storage house enables the big capitalist to force up the price of butter, eggs, meat and various perishable commodities, and the grand old excuse of "short crop" does the rest.

Only a year ago when round steak reached 25 cents in Cleveland it was because so many cattle men were quitting business, but this year round steak is 20 cents and the reason is because so many are raising beef cattle, but certainly the round steaks we buy never were cut from a yearling.

One year's harvest in the United States would feed the world; the next year, with the world needing our foodstuffs, prices are high, because we cannot supply the demand. Here, I think, is the real reason: Across the street from my home there is a little store. When prices began to rise this little merchant, not to be outdone, "because of the war," started to raise prices on the stock on hand, some of it so aged that it had given up all hope of being sold.

One item that has not risen "on account of the war" is soup. Soup still sells at the old price. But the little merchant across the street calmly tacked an extra cent on the price of soup because, as she says, "everything is going up."

Everything certainly is, and when there is no valid excuse they drag in the aged excuse of supply and demand or short crop, and the great American public swallows it.

Any one with power of seeing will notice this same process in every line. People are paying 100 per cent. profit on goods that have laid on dealers' and jobbers' shelves till they are shriveling with old age, and if one dealer or jobber or manufacturer starts the ball rolling, it is passed along to the ultimate consumer as the real reason why he is paying such advance.

Just now certain dealers are increasing prices for their goods because "wages are going up." Wages are going up in many lines, but in that particular line the dealers are dragging down extra profits by a deliberate lie because they anticipate that next year wage workers in that line will demand more money.

I was one of a committee of decorators to wait upon an employer a few years ago to demand a reduction in the rake-off of 20 per cent., which the firms charged us for the privilege of working for them. The boss proved that they had to have 20 per cent. because there were so many jobs unpaid for because of inferior workmanship. He said the losses amounted to 15 per cent.

Later on the same gentleman met me as spokesman for people who proposed to buy his business and he proved just as easily that his firm never lost over 5 per cent. in unpaid accounts and not a cent for poor workmanship because, said he, we never employ poor mechanics.

Strip this whole question of cant and you'll find that the increased cost of living is caused by the adherence of the virtual monopolists in the various industrial lines to the good old slogan, "Charge all that the traffic will bear."

If the average father and mother had a rudimentary knowledge of medicine, doctors' visits would not be $2 per; and if the average father and mother had not lost the art of preparing their foodstuffs they would not be at the mercy of the dealers in prepared foods.

There would be real competition then. Now the competition consists in the little fellows following the lead of the big fellows and soaking or get soaked; for, as I once heard a steel trust official say, "No labor union can exist in our business because we can supply the needs of the U. S. in three months. It is then optional whether our plants run or not." Talk about freedom of contract!

GEO. H. LONG.

THE WAGE QUESTION.

The uninformed reader would infer, after reading Mr. Martin's article on "Legislation and Wage Rates" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 2, that the wages of railroad trainmen have been and are now adequate, considering the hazard, toil and exactions of their employment. The fact of the matter is that when one impartially considers the true conditions under which the steam train operators have been and are now working, he will wonder how the companies get as many men to slave for them as they do. Following is a table showing the standard rate of wages an hour paid in Chicago, which is typical of other cities. These tables were taken from the Locomotive Firemen's and Enginemen's Magazine for October, 1916:

Building Employees.

Bricklayers, portable and hoisting engineers, inside wiremen, plasterers, plumbers and gas fitters, steam fitters, stone-masons, and tile layers.	75
Lathers and marble setters.	71.9
Carpenters, painters and slate tile roofers.	70
Elevator constructors.	68.8
Structural iron workers.	68
Composition roofers.	65
Laborers in tunnels, wells and caissons.	57.5
Laborers on windlass, trench and scaffold work.	50
Plaster laborers.	50
Composition roofers' helpers.	45
Elevator constructor helpers and tile layer helpers.	43.8
Marble setter helpers.	42.5
Excavating laborers, hod carriers and steam fitter helpers.	40

Railway Employees.

Locomotive engineers in Chicago railroad yards.	42.5
Switching foremen.	38
Switchmen.	35
Locomotive firemen in Chicago railroad yards.	27

A comparison of these tables will show that Mr. Martin's supposition to the effect that "the trainmen have all along been and still are receiving a wage out of proportion to that received by other laborers" is born of ignorance of the facts.

Farther along Mr. Martin says, "production has been facilitated by labor-saving machinery and scientific devices; but this is about offset by the lessened efficiency of the laborer. By inefficiency, we mean the shorter hours and the inability for continued exertion." This is the stock argument of the labor exploiter in his effort to prevent labor from getting a just share of that which it produces. It is well known, to those who have studied the matter and are not intentionally short-sighted, that a reduction in working hours from ten to eight, for those whose duties require great mental and physical effort, does not mean lessened efficiency in any sense of the word. On the contrary, just the opposite is true.

Mr. Martin tells us that a great many young men are leaving the farm for the railroad. Such, unfortunately for the young men, is the case. Twelve years ago the writer, lured by the stories of the fabulous wages paid railroad men, pestered a locomotive roundhouse foreman until finally he decided the easiest course was to give in, and I was put to work. And if the advice of one who knows through several years of experience, both the farm and the railroad, is worthy of attention, let the young men on the farm take heed and stay where they are.

"I doubt not," says Mr. Martin, "but that in all fairness the railroads will be entitled to a rate increase, in case the Adamson law is upheld." He might have added that, while the cost of labor and materials has gone upward to some extent, the real cause of the financial situation which the railroad officials claim, is seriously embarrassing them, is to be found in the gigantic "steals" which have been pulled off in past years. If Mr. Martin wants the facts, I suggest that he read up on the money grabbing schemes of the Louisville & Nashville, Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, New York, New Haven & Hartford, and other railroads too numerous to mention. To illustrate: Not a great while ago the officials of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific were sued in the United States Court at Chicago to recover back from them $7,000,000 which they had "lifted." About two years ago, when the "Frisco" went into the hands of the receiver, the same thing took place, except that in the case of the "Frisco" the amount stolen was more than $15,000,000. And yet the officials of these roads have the nerve to come to Congress and demand higher freight and passenger rates; and when the underpaid trainmen present their demands for a wage commensurate with the work performed and the hazard assumed, the robbers cry "Hold-up."

The general public apparently is oblivious to what is taking place in the world of railroad "high finance." The brotherhoods, however, have their eyes open, and even though the financial jugglers continue to squeeze the public, they are just about through gouging their train service employees.

Virtues of a Model Husband.

I never fuss,
I never fight,
I always come
Straight home at night.
I always give
My wife my pay,
Nor hold it up
A single day.

I have no lodge,
I have no club;
Perhaps you think
That I'm a dub.
Mayhap I am,
But even so,
It save me lots
Of fuss and woe.

No crap games
Out behind our shed,
With Jim and Bill
And Tom and Ned.
Those good old sports
I used to know,
For wife says
They've got to go.

And, sad to say,
Her word is law,
Or she says she'll
Go home to ma.
Perhaps you think
That I'm too nice,
But I'm for peace
At any price.

A WOMAN'S WORK.

A year book published in Northfield, Vt., has the following rhyme on the cover:

"Men work from morn till set of sun."
They do.

"But a woman's work is never done."
Quite true.

For when one task she's finished something's found
Awaiting a beginning all year round.

Whether it be
To draw the tea,
Or bake the bread,
Or make the bed,
Or ply the broom,
Or dust the room,
Or floor to scrub,
Or knives to rub,
Or table set,
Or meals to get,
Or shelves to scan,
Or fruit to can,
Or seeds to sow,
Or plants to grow,
Or linens bleach,
Or lessons teach,
Or butter churn,
Or jackets turn,
Or polish glass,
Or plate or brass,
Or clothes to mend,
Or children tend,
Or notes indite,
Or stories write—

But I must stop, for really if I should Name all the orts, take me a day it would.

THE HAND OF GOD

and Other

Posthumous Essays

By

GRANT ALLEN

Most intelligent Freethinkers are familiar with Mr. Grant Allen's work, "The Evolution of the Idea of God," but fewer have read his supplementary book called "The Hand of God," in which he intended to explicate further some personal views regarding the origin of religion. The book takes its name from the opening chapter, which, with the three chapters on "The Worship of Death," were designed to be the opening section of a volume supplemental to the better known work. The book under present notice, consists of fifteen essays of striking and permanent interest. Here are some of the titles: "Immortality and Resurrection," "The Mystery of Birth," "What is the Object of Life," "Practical Religion," and "Spencer and Darwin." Grant Allen needs no special introduction to the Rationalist, but in this little volume he appears at his best—highly interesting, always instructive, and fascinating to a degree. There are few books of essays of higher merit, especially for the liberal minded, than "The Hand of God."

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. The announcement that we have it is sufficient.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Benson, the Socialist, received only 750,000, compared with 901,873 cast for Debs in 1912. The total vote of the country as tabulated was 18,638,871, as compared with 15,045,322 four years ago. This increase of 3,593,549 is due to the increase in population in part, but mostly to the woman vote in the new suffrage states. In this vote Mr. Wilson had a plurality over Mr. Hughes of 568,822, and lacked 703,136 of having a majority.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

December 25, the Russians repulsed the enemy in the region of Batogu and Vilinu. Some German airplanes dropped bombs on the line of the Buzco-Braila Railway. The airplanes landed and an officer and two soldiers were taken prisoners. British detachments made an attack on the German lines in the Ypres salient, but were repulsed. In the Champagne region a sudden attack by the Prussians upon the French trenches west of Auberive was repulsed.

December 27, the British forces captured the strong Turkish position at Maghdabar, ninety miles east of the Suez Canal, and wiped out almost the entire garrison of 2,000 men. The Allies have agreed that there shall be no thought of peace until victory has been achieved.

Northwest of Lake Doiran (Macedonia) several British companies, after strong artillery preparations, unsuccessfully attacked Bulgarian outposts. The 400 officers and 6,000 men in the Greek division which surrendered to the Bulgarians at Kavala, have been ordered by King Constantine to fight against the Entente Allies.

December 30, Mackensen's troops made big advances at virtually every point on the Wallachian front. The Austro-German forces of the Archduke Joseph have undertaken a drive on the Moldavian Mountain frontier to break through to a junction with Mackensen's armies. The Finnish steamer Oihanna, of 1,070 tons, with a regiment of Russian Coast Artillery from the Aland Islands on board, struck a mine and sank in a few minutes. All on board were lost with the exception of fifty persons.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizer Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

RELIGION AND HYGIENE.

Faith Discarded, the Struggle for Supremacy Lay Between Medicine and Surgery.

BY JULES GOLDSCHMIDT, M.D., Paris.

THE old Arabian medical adage: Quod medicamenta non sanant, ferrum sanat, quod ferrum non sanat, ignis sanat et quo ignis non sanat, id vere non sanandum est (What remedies cannot cure, the knife cures; what the knife is incapable of curing, fire does; and what fire does not cure, that verily can never be cured) is the earliest trace of the struggle for supremacy between internal (medicine) and operative treatment (surgery). The latter, indeed, has from the dawn of civilization onwards been of only intermittent and rare application—in case of accident, or tribal fights, or in the national wars with which mankind inaugurated and has continued to illustrate his terrestrial career through the uncounted thousands of years down to the present gigantic world-war with its millions of victims. On the other hand humanity has during all these millenniums been unceasingly plagued with innumerable diseases which claimed assistance and relief from friends or professionals, till ineluctable death might kindly put an end to all woes and pains.

We are somewhat surprised to discover that the Bible, which abounds in more or less miraculous cures, does not mention doctors¹ and their position in the Hebrew theocracy. We must therefore infer that the healing art (more properly called business) was left in the hands of quacks, priests and prophets. Leviticus (ii, 15) contains in prolix biblical style quite a medical dissertation, addressed to the priests, on the treatment of certain gynecological cases, and on leprosy,² probably an imperfectly understood disease and often confounded with the frequent skin affections which the chosen children of Jehovah contracted during their forty years' peregrinations in the desert, deprived of a sufficient supply of water, and, like true Orientals, neglecting cleanliness of the body, scarcely washing hands and feet according to ritual prescription. Parenthetically I cannot refrain from mentioning one Old Testament detail, characteristic of priestcraft, viz.; that Moses did not omit the exaction of a fee for treatment, in the shape of a sacrifice to the ever invisible dweller in the sacred ark, who did not offer gratuitous help. In this respect there is a contrast with Christ's miraculous cures, performed to further his imaginary mission, and often with the express condition that they should not be divulged (Matt. viii, 4; Mark viii, 26). Jesus's medical knowledge did not differ from the ordinary priestly wisdom, which considered disease the consequence of sin, the work of impure, malignant, fiendish spirits and devils.

The new gospel is even more inimical to cleanliness than the old. It neglects, even forbids, that powerful aid to the preservation of health. Hence, through the succeeding ages, it was the cause of innumerable infections. Holiness before cleanliness has from earliest Christian times, across the middle ages down to modern days, been almost a dogma—a dogma still faithfully and reverently observed by priests, monks and nuns, who are known for their peculiar smell, the "odeur de sainteté"—the saintlike odor. Of that, and of its evil consequences to health and to morals, more on another occasion.

The savior's miracles put medicine and surgery on the same level, for he cured internal and external complaints equally by the imposition of his hands, without further preparation, or as a substitute for operation, and in one case in the very repulsive way of spitting on the eyeballs of the blind. (Mark vii, 33; viii, 23; John ix, 6.)

Medicine-men surely existed in the primitive savage tribal life of humanity, just as we find them still in the centre of Africa, in the almost inaccessible virgin forests of the Amazon, and among the Eskimos of the Arctic zones—men who knew the wholesome or poisonous effects of many plants and animals, the virtue of massage, the application of skin irritants. In fact, they possess quite a pharmaceutical arsenal, of which civilized nations, not always able to trace the origin, have largely profited and still profit. We owe to the Indians of South America, amongst other drugs, cinchona, coca, curare; to the negroes of Africa, kola—all introduced into Europe in historical or quite recent times. So too the learned priests of Isis and Osiris doubtless got their remedies from the tropical regions of the dark continent, and by their knowledge attracted many patients and learned men from afar. All modern African explorers express astonishment at the wonderfully varied knowledge possessed by these medicine-men of medicinal plants and their application. Surgery on the other hand is unknown except the brutal severing of limbs with rusty or wooden knives and the stopping of hemorrhage with hot irons or herbs or embers. The savage world is totally ignorant of surgery. No exception to this rule is found even among the half-civilized nations, now perished, of Peru and the Aztecs: On many skulls found in the land of the Incas are small round holes, resembling those made in the operation of trepanning, which might indicate superior surgical skill, but the holes are sometimes very numerous on one cranium, or are so placed that they could not have been of any practical operative use. The explanation offered is that they were post-mortem, probably religious acts. We know how deftly and with what cruelty the priests of both these nations could open the thorax with their obsidian knives and offer the palpitating heart of the human sacrifice to their monster gods.

In primitive society, non-interference was certainly a boon for the wounded. They were less exposed to infection. The savage seems to offer more resistance to pathogenic (i. e., wound poisoning) germs than his refined civilized brother. The African explorer Schweinfurth, a very reliable observer, often expressed astonishment at the rapidity with which, under the most simple dressing, serious wounds healed amongst the carriers and soldiers of his caravan.

In the Indian holy books, contrary to what we have said of the sacred records of Hebrews and Christians, we find taught quite a therapeutical system, from which many interesting facts, as for example the use of opiates, have reached Europe. Naturally besides plants possessing real sanative power, there were many formerly highly appreciated which have entirely disappeared from our pharmacopœia—the renowned silphium from Cyrenaica, for which was paid manyfold its weight in gold, the mysterious Theriac, the Bezoar and many others. China offers to-day the spectacle of the survival of such antiquated remedies in addition to numberless objectionable abominations and superstitions. In the Flowery Land medicine (if we may apply the name to such incredible ignorance and prejudice) resists western science and rejects its beneficent gifts, unconvinced even by its neighbors, the Japanese, who have not only assimilated all our teaching of medicine and surgery but already contribute efficiently to the progress of the sciences.

The medical knowledge of ancient Greece was part of divine worship, and therefore in the hands of priests who favored superstition and ignorance. Surgeons too were of divine origin; the brothers Machaon and Podalirion mentioned by Homer were descended from the god Æsculapius; the immortal poet of the Iliad praises them by saying that one medical man was worth a hundred fighting men. Modern war has not altered this appreciation, still true after 3,000 years. With the evolution of the wonderful Greek civilization of the fourth century, Medicine found a worthy representative in Hippocrates of Cos (460 B. C.), who codified and from his own experience and observation amplified all contemporary medical knowledge. In his famous works he attempted not only to describe diseases but also to investigate their causes. He remained for many centuries the undisputed master of medical science; even now the perusal of his works is interesting to the student. Hippocrates was an opponent of operative intervention, and for more than a thousand years he established the supremacy of medicine over surgery. Notwithstanding the many disciples he left, priestly cures continued to flourish. In the temple at Epidaurus the suffering pilgrims slept in the courtyard, where god Æsculapius revealed himself in their dreams and assured them of certain cure and restored health. The temple acolytes interpreted the dream oracles, and dismissed the credulous worshipers with prescriptions and remedies.

The continuance through many centuries of such a sacrosanct delusion has parallels among fanatic Mohammedans and Christians; among the faithful of Islam a slip of paper containing an appropriate verse of the Koran is soaked in water and swallowed as an infallible panacea; Christians expect renewed health from prayer, from relics, from sanctified water (as in the grotto of Lourdes), or from the offering of ex-votos to the virgin and the saints. Sancta simplicitas! From all time the miracle has been faith's cherished child; the unreflecting multitude prefers inconceivable wonders to rational scientific action. More than 2,000 years after Epidaurus, such absurdity still exists in the teaching of Christian Scientists, who represent a relapse to the oldest, ineradicable superstitions, an insult to the majesty of modern medical science and its unceasing, victorious advance into the very heart of Nature's secrets. Christian Science is founded on intolerable ignorance and childish illusions, wrapped up in a religious garb. Æsculapius and Christ walk hand in hand, smiling, like the ancient augurs, at the credulity of their worshipers!

Roman medical science, as represented by the works of Celsus and Galen, was entirely based on Greek authors, especially on Hippocrates. With the spread of Latin as the universal language of study in the middle ages, these two authors became the oracles of all the medical schools; the only additions made were superficial, inane philosophical speculations, or compilations from Arabic authors, who also derived their wisdom more from the Greek books than from observation or experiment. The doctor medicina, undisputed master of surgeon and apothecary, hiding his ignorance under a theological and philosophical phraseology, lasted far into the eighteenth century. Molière has given us a matchless picture of him.

For a short time it seemed as if surgery was to obtain the ascendancy over medicine with the coming of Ambroise Paré (1517-90), called the Father of Surgery, who invented arterial ligature, thus obviating the most appalling danger of hemorrhage, the abundant loss of blood. But the success of operations remained as doubtful as before, owing to post-operative infections, generally mortal. Paré used to say, "I operate, and God heals"—an acknowledgment of his own insufficiency, notwithstanding all his innovations in the dressing of wounds, which were universally treated with boiling oil. He himself tells us that at the siege of Pampeluna, when he had only sufficient oil for a few of the wounded soldiers, he could not sleep for thinking how badly the others would fare. He rejoiced all the more when next morning he observed that they seemed to fare better. From that time wounds were let alone, but still dressed with soiled linen and lint.

¹ Luke iv, 23: "Ye will surely say unto me this proverb: Physician heal thyself"—a proverb which proves the existence of doctors at the time of Jesus but in view of his own extensive practice, the physicians' work must have been of questionable merit.

² Compare also Deuteronomy xxiv, 8. "Take heed in the plague of leprosy, that those observe diligently and do according that the priests, the Levites shall teach you; as I commanded them, so you shall observe to do."

So surgery walked through another three centuries, never sure of success, always trembling before the various post-operative risks, and applied to only in extreme cases, till at last in the year 1869 Lister introduced antiseptics into the operations and the dressing of wounds. Since then antiseptics has improved into asepsis,³ which has become an absolutely reliable defense against all wound infections, and allows us to perform, with hitherto undreamed of security, the most daring operations, formerly considered criminal undertakings whenever hinted at. This new era is completed by anesthesia, which was known long before antiseptics was invented, and has delivered poor humanity from the primordial curse, pain. The two united have changed surgery from a hazard into an art and a science, sure of its purpose and confident in its results. In contradiction to Paré, the surgeon of to-day proudly says, "I operate and I heal"—God's interference having become quite useless. Furthermore, this extraordinary scientific revolution has lifted man in this domain of his activity from the slough of superstition and uncertainty on to the firm ground of truth and confidence. Bacteriology, which taught Lister his sovereign method, has made a wide breach in the walls of that tyrannical, oppressive stronghold, religion.

Surgery has not only gained absolute control of its work in the treatment of wounds, in the removal of growths, in entering into the remotest parts of the human organism; it can also in many cases redress the inefficiency of organs, or remove parts such as the appendix, unnecessary to healthy life, yet continually endangering it. Here too this new craft boldly interferes with God's masterwork, the human frame, and is capable of improving it. Plaudite; give applause unwillingly, ye priests with your blind followers; accept the benefits of science when smitten with diseases which no prayers, no shrines, no relics can cure!

From 1869 onwards surgery has become more and more intrepid, and what seemed the uncontested domain of medicine was gradually invaded by the fearless men of the knife; our initial Arabian adage seemed changed into: "What remedies cannot cure, the knife cures." A reaction set in, however, a quarter of a century later, which allowed the physician to vindicate his lost superiority and assert himself the equal of his upstart brother. Pasteur's immense revolutionary discoveries progressively exercised a beneficial influence on therapeutists. The master himself laid the foundations of a new medical science by his famous hydrophobia cure, based on laboratory experiments, but still in its application quite empirical. Since then another branch of bacteriology has been successfully cultivated—serotherapy—thanks to which various infections, formerly most murderous, can now be either prevented or attenuated or even cured. Everybody knows the beneficial results of the anti-diphtheric, anti-typhoid and anti-tetanus serums, to mention only the principal and generally approved ones. Tracheotomy, not long ago the extreme measure for saving life in a diphtheria epidemic, is to-day obsolete, provided that the serum is applied at once and in sufficient doses. Syphilis, which in its later stages frequently necessitated operation, can now be more than ever successfully treated when taken early and with modern methods. There is only one apparently infectious disease, cancer, left as a bone of contention between medicine and surgery.

We have now happily arrived at the long-awaited moment when both important branches of the healing art have become equally efficient, and when the old struggle has ended in peaceful and equally successful work.

But the goal which these united sciences have to reach is still far distant; it is the absolute control over all pathogenic germs, which are the causes of nine-tenths of all human diseases, of mankind's thanatology.

Bacteriology and public as well as individual hygiene promise to guide us to the realization of our foremost wish, to lead a healthy life free from pain and disease, till, at a very advanced age, welcome death will close a happy and useful existence.

After Reading the Bible.

I suppose that the most overrated book in the world is that book called the Bible; and were an estimate placed upon it from its real and inherent worth, without the exalted influence it gets by being termed the word of God, it would shrink and shrivel like a toy balloon with the air out.

A book which requires artificial boosting, which is put forth under false pretenses, and actually forced upon the people, as was always the case with this one, must get and retain an unwarranted reputation. Anything with merit in its make-up, with solid and substantial parts joined together, will stand alone and need no assistance that God or anything else can confer upon it.

When we look at this literary curiosity in sixty-six sections, with thousands of years between the first and the last one; with its unknown writers and no definite period of time in which any of them wrote, we are not surprised that the book is a jumble of fables and fiction, of crude ignorance, distorted and unreliable history, conflicting statements, visionary nonsense, and the worst kind of superstition and religious fanaticism. If anything else could be expected of such a book, expectations could not have a reasonable foundation.

We get the mental state and capacity of the men who wrote it, and it reveals their divergence of thought, their utter inharmony, and their inability to see in one age of the world as men saw at a later period; for codes of morals were changed, and social laws and customs became obsolete as different ideas prevailed and found expression.

Any person who reads this book with a mind free from prejudice in its favor, will go into no rapture or ecstasy over anything it contains, nor be convinced that it is the abode of unadulterated truth which God alone could reveal. Feelings of awe, wonder and admiration will not be excited, for such a reader will look in vain for any indication that an omniscient God is talking to him in writing produced by the human hand; but there will be wonder at who Baron Munchausen's predecessor may happen to have been, and at what time he lived and wrote the story of creation, with subsequent events that were of the same fictional character and fully as baseless and improbable; and a great admiration will be felt for him as a first-class romancer, with such good judgment of human nature that he could put forth that stuff knowing it would find acceptance by credulous mortals, and be for ages a standard and undisputed authority for millions on the subjects dealt with. Whoever he was, we may say in modern parlance, he was a cracker jack, for his Adam and Eve rib-story and apple incident, with a talking serpent and a personal God that went from place to place, has stood the test of credulity for thousands of years, and is yet accepted with reverence and foolishness—a combination of attributes inseparable to sound and God-pleasing faith—by untold numbers, who make no active use of their brains for fear of offending God.

What an imagination the man had, and how conspicuous his standing in that remote age as a fictionist and depicter of fanciful things! What a salary he could command in these days from the moving picture promoters were he only with us; and how surprising that none of the film artists utilize his still popular conception of how the human race started, with the delights found in the garden of Eden, to catch the great American dollar. What an aid such pictures would be to the pulpit these times in filling the empty pews, now so common throughout the world because people are thinking and reflecting; for anything to keep the Bible in the limelight is and always was the preacher's policy.

As we leave the story of creation and move on in contemplation of things that happened afterwards, and read page after page of sacred stuff that is a waste of time, and of no interest or importance in this day and age of the world, rational-minded men cannot prevent wondering how that old product of antiquity retains its power and influence in society; but only one reason can be found for it, and that is natural credulity bedded in mental stupidity, where the masses still linger, and every priest hopes to keep them.

What do we care, and why should we care, for thoughts and views of life held and made known by Abraham, Moses, David, Solomon or any of those old Hebrews who lived in what was mental darkness compared with the intellectual illumination of our era; and why should we wish or desire to pattern after them in shaping our lives? And this query also applies to every character in the New Testament, for we need none of them to tell us what to think or how to live. If we will only use our own brains, and think independently of Bible influence, we can meet and solve all the problems of life that confront us; and in the school of everyday experience, can learn far more than they can tell us. They are all "back numbers," and none of them fit this age of the world any more than the sanitary system of Moses would be applicable to modern times and conditions. We are as far ahead of them in scientific attainments as the locomotive is ahead of the burro they used as a pack and saddle beast, or as the printing press is of hand writing; and when we consider the art of war, which was one of their specialties, and often practiced, the modern Christian has them "skinned a mile," to use Billy Sunday language.

And when it comes to another world in which we may and may not live, we can tell them just as much as they can tell us—which is nothing—and no more. As a source of information about another world and another existence in it, the Bible is of no more importance than the Koran, or any other book written by men like ourselves. With two codes of morals in it, including two views of marriage and divorce, it surely looks as though God, its author, did change his mind at times, though the book asserts the contrary.

As the Bible speaks of the four corners of the earth, the natural supposition is that God has changed its shape since he so referred to it, for to get corners on a spherical formation would be more than miraculous.

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

The Late Sir Hiram Maxim.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS BY F. J. GOULD,

Delivered at West Norwood Cemetery, Nov. 28, 1916, and Reported in the Literary Guide.

Hiram Stevens Maxim wished to die in harness, and he wished his wife to survive him; and both these wishes were realized. When he died, in his seventy-seventh year, his unwearied hands had only a few days before plied one of their innumerable tasks in the art and craft of machinery. And those last few days were solaced by hands that plied the yet nobler art of the wife and companion.

He was a man so individual in his achievements, his manner of life, and his outlook that our Memorial Address must necessarily take a form that reflects his character, and embody thoughts and recollections that strike away from the line of conventionality, while yet retaining touch with his essential qualities of manliness and honesty. He was a personality of such notable energy, original ideas, and breezy humor that even in this solemn house of death we are compelled to honor his memory by avoidance of dry and stilted compliment, and of any word that would have seemed to him too formal or affected. England and America had combined in him their genial idiosyncrasies, and produced a gift for good-natured laughter that forbade—and forbids—a mourning tribute too labored and too heavy.

Maxim's great characteristics were candor and directness, and a career spent half in America and half in England and Europe illustrated those characteristics in his mechanical work and in his social and intellectual outlook. He loved the fact, and nothing but the fact, with a downright passion, whether in the machine-shop or a discussion on the meaning of life and the universe. His native America furnished him with one of her favorite ideals—Efficiency. And the picture that might best represent his genius would show him as a mechanical draughtsman, instrument in hand, and making designs with a loving and, one might almost say, religious exactness. Looking a little deeper into his nature, we should detect the same enthusiasm taking another shape in his contempt for a superstition or an outworn creed.

Sir Hiram Maxim came of Huguenot stock, which one traces from France, through Canterbury, through a seventeenth-century emigration to New England, and so, in the first half of the nineteenth century, to a modest homestead in the little town of Sangerville in the state of Maine. Hiram was the eldest of eight children. The mother, a woman of sterling character, raised the flax and spun the cloth that provided clothing for the family; and the neighbors, much versed in Bible literature, must have thought of the Hebrew "Wise Woman": "She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eatgeth not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her." From the father, who was inclined to quiet reflection and study, the son drew his capacity for concentration of thought and for invention; and even the idea of the famous gun is said to have been lightly foreshadowed in his ingenious brain. The boy's extraordinary ability for plodding was illustrated in his hacking at a fir tree with a butcher's knife daily for a fortnight till he had completely fell it. His well-made wheelbarrows and other such handiwork astonished the local craftsmen. Powerful in physique and intensely alert with hand and eye, he excelled as an artisan, and promised to be much more. But, amid all his activities, he had a tender thought for the nurturing arms that had protected his youth, and out of his savings the young man bought a house for his mother's dwelling. Wandering from city to city, from workshop to workshop, he developed his genius; and in 1881 a device of his connected with electric-lighting had earned him a decoration from the land of his Huguenot ancestors—that of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

It was a natural destiny that carried this master of mechanical arts to England (where he became naturalized), and sent him all over Europe, interviewing scientists, engineers, and princes, from Moscow to Madrid. As Faust symbolized the learning of the Middle Ages, so to modern Europe Maxim symbolized the magic of machinery. If the machinery was so often military, it was because Europe itself called for that development. It must be remembered that Sir Hiram had equal talent for milder spheres; and he struck out ideas for automatic gas machines, electric lamps, and an inhaler to relieve bronchitis. Of this inhaler he himself said, with a touch of satire, that he sacrificed the fame he had earned by his gun through inventing a life-saving apparatus.

He was enormously fond of work, whether in hours of the night, or dawn, or noon, and typified the dynamic of the Twentieth Century Mansoul. But he could always unbend for a drollery; was ever ready to satisfy journalists eager for interesting news from his wonder-world; had a bluff, democratic way with folk of all social classes, and had no little faculty for entertaining by means of the popular lecture.

The candor and directness which so distinguished him led him to state, with an openness that was never mistaken for bitterness, his dissent from theological forms of thought, and from all endeavors to convert such intelligent non-Christian races as the Chinese from their ancient religion and ethics. His intimate friendship with His Excellency the late Li Hung Chang heightened his interest in China and its Confucian philosophy, and strengthened his objections to missionary intrusion. On such topics he pretended to no academic gift of expression. He very bluntly delivered his view, and had no reserves. To the aims and work of the Rationalist Press Association he offered his unqualified support. He had traveled much; seen much of men and manners; come into contact with all sorts and conditions; viewed life in rough-and-ready workshops, crowded cities, sleepy villages, and the world of the elite; seen many religious aspects—Puritan, Anglican, Roman, Byzantine; and the decision reached by his robust common-sense was that civilization and theology were no longer compatible. Rejoicing at the advances of knowledge in the nineteenth century he looked forward to a vast emancipation in the twentieth. "I believe the present century," he said, "will be a century of religious and moral reform; a reform that will be startling both in its range and influence."

Many societies, commercial and learned, welcomed him into membership. Decorations were liberally bestowed. He was accorded English knighthood. Our authorities of war gladly availed themselves of his services on the panel of technical advisers. He had "warmed both hands at the fire of life." He was appreciated for his inventive artistry, his brusque good nature, his sincerity and generosity. If one cared to spy for faults in his record, they would be found connected with his disdain for hypocrisy, and the sort of combativeness which is illustrated in one of his old-age reminiscences. In a little town in Maine he had witnessed the ill-treatment of a lame man by three pert youths who were unaware of his presence, and he took swift action and dealt out summary justice. "I told the young fellows," he says, "that I had seen them abuse the poor cripple, and that I had punished them for it."

The royal appreciation was manifested by kind communications in the days of his last illness. It was natural that the incident should prompt his wife to take a backward glance to his early years in New England. He had there, as a rustic boy, run about, bare-footed in the village streets. His tireless hands—cutting, hammering, planing, painting, fitting, intricately adjusting—had made a way for him from the cottage in Maine to the scientific circles and Courts of Europe. One aptly recalls the proverb of the ancient Hebrews: "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men."

In his final sickness it was from his wife's hands that he cared most to receive comfort and tender services. She and his grandson saw his face change into the smile of death. And of the many messages of sympathy that poured in after his passing there was one which cited a stanza, repeated now at his wife's desire:

Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Life's crown well won,
Now comes rest.

And this crown is that simple and precious one that symbolizes the accomplishment of the best and most honest work the craftsman knew and understood. There was in this inventor the genius which is so amazing a sign of the growing triumph of humanity over the forces and materials of nature, and which will, in the coming ages, yield to our much-enduring and undaunted race, rich blessings of civilization, progress, and peaceable mastery of our planet.

Chat from Chicago.

"For the love of Mike!" This is the only protest that is strong enough to fit the case. These are troublous time in the Chicago Rationalist Association, and it is all along of "Jawn D.," who gave twelve millions of his money (or was it the people's money?) to the Chicago University. The professors of this university are foes to "sweet reason." They are willing to lecture for the new liberal society which is getting ready to begin to start, but it still hangs fire for lack of a name. These professors are fearful of losing their jobs if they come out in the open and lecture for a society bearing a Rationalist name. Aye, there's the rub! To be Scott-Nearingized is not to their taste. To occupy the center of the stage is a natural ambition, and if the timid professors want to get into the limelight, they must take their chances with the university authorities.

The people of the Ethical Culture Association also desire to join forces with this new Sunday evening society, back of which is, of course, the Chicago Rationalist Association, but they too shy at a Rationalist name. A majority of the board of directors favor a name that bears the hall mark of Rationalism. Among the number, you may be sure, is the first vice-president, E. C. Reidewald, who cries, "No quarter."

At the present moment the title, "Sunday Evening Fellowship Club" is temporarily adopted. A stranger consulting the Sunday papers to find a place to go will say, "That Brotherhood Club is not for mine. It does not mean anything, Ah! here we are! Chicago Freethought Society. I know what that means. I'll go hear H. Percy Ward."

A very recherché dinner was given in the fine rooms of a prominent club in the Stevens Building to settle this momentous question. You can't fool some people ANY of the time—for instance, the Freethinkers of "the old guard." They are up in arms with "a call to the colors," now that they realize that a reactionary movement is setting in all over the country, and they do not purpose to give way to half-baked, pseudo liberals, and semi-religious bodies whose ambition is to cater to the church or moneyed element. Now that we have got the churches "on the run," let us not give up the advantages which were so dearly bought by centuries of suffering and persecution in the Rationalist and scientific fields.

Say! Listen! (this is the classical American exhortation): Is it not unthinkable that Clarence Darrow should line up with these timid professors and Ethical people? Clarence Darrow, who in my calendar is or was one of the mortal gods, colossal, sublime! I can no longer worship at his shrine, for he has lost his reason. A non-rationalistic title for the new society is his decision.

Darrow's law partner, Mr. Sissman, made up for Darrow's defection in a ringing speech which was applauded to the echo, in which he urged the Rationalists to stand by their colors. His forceful words put me in mind of E. M. Macdonald's exhortation at the time of the Buffalo Congress. It is as strong and applicable to-day as when it was penned, and needs no excuse to be put in print again:

"Let all Liberals stand up for the cause of true Liberalism at this momentous time. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battleground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake."

With truth on our side, what have we to fear? If need be let these professors share the fate of the ex-priest "Bill McGee," who was hounded by the police and jailed; or like S. P. Putnam step down and out of a discredited pulpit and live in a garret on ten cents a day, sooner than surrender to superstition and hypocrisy. The road to freedom often comes through a prison door, says Mazzini.

Scott Bennett, the noted Australian Rationalist lecturer, expressed much the same sentiment in a brief but powerful appeal from H. Percy Ward's platform Sunday, Dec. 24. I heard this really great speaker in San Francisco, and I said then, that he was the finest that had "come down the pike," in a long while.

It will be readily seen that Rationalism has become too fashionable. As in fashion's world, when a style has become too common and is aped by the common people, the elite drop it and adopt something else. See THE TRUTH SEEKER for the long list of societies having a Rationalistic title. Behold them now discredited. Even so do Mangasarian's famous publication, the Rationalist, and the Rationalist Press Association of London come in for condemnation. It would be wisdom for all these to adopt a title to please the universities! Let us suppose the case that these Rationalist Associations wish to take advantage of the talented, erudite lecturers of the Chicago University, and you will at once see that they would need to change their Rational title before they could hope to have them lecture before their societies.

Certainly the influence and scholarly attainments of Prof. George Burman Foster are worthy of great consideration, but not to the extent of dominating the splendid enterprises of the Chicago Rationalist Association. E. E. Wentworth, the president, is a most generous supporter of all the Rationalist Associations of Chicago, and as a man of peace wants to please everybody, but this herculean task is much beyond him. How are we to hold up his hands without sacrificing our principles and surrendering to forces which we detect as reactionary ones, however skillfully they are hidden. Who is to deliver us from the body of this death?

Oregon's Vote Against the Sunday Law.

The official statement of the complete returns of the votes on the Oregon Sunday law are that the Sunday law was wiped out by the vote of 125,336 to 93,525: thus by a majority of 31,811 in a total vote of 218,861.

That is fine; but there is more to the story that shows it to be better yet.

There were eleven measures before the people for decision by general vote. On only two of these measures was there a larger vote than on the Sunday law; and on only one of these two was there a larger majority than that against the Sunday law.

Both of these two measures that called out a larger vote than did the Sunday law were temperance measures. The intelligent people of Oregon dealt with the Sunday law as in the same relative field with the brewery and liquor: and that is right and thoroughly deserved.

Thus in an election of the casting of a full vote only the third of the fullest vote cast on any measure was that on the Sunday law; and only the second largest majority on any measure was that on the Sunday law.—American Sentinel.

Invasion of Palestine.

Though all may love the gentle Christ,
The name of Christian jars,
When it's "onward, Christian soldiers,"
To sacrifice to Mars.

Yes, go onward, Christian soldiers,
That all the world may see
Your shrapnel sprinkle Bethlehem;
Your cross-fire, Calvary.

The Immortality of the Soul.

Anent the Christian faith in the immortality of the soul I am compelled to say that I do not know that I have a soul. We are told that the soul of man lives after his body dies. But no one says this that can prove the statement. I am willing to admit that there is a great deal of loose faith in the survival of something in man after death, but there is no knowledge of such survival. And to-day faith proves nothing.

What man wishes to know is: What survives the circumstance of death? What lives after the man dies? All are willing to allow that the body perishes utterly: that its form is destroyed; that its parts are consumed; that, so far as we see man, there is nothing of him left after death has done its perfect work. To me man is a material man. I know of no part of man that is not material. It would be a bold philosopher who would dare say that there is in the human body a tenant that is independent of that body.

We all know that any substance that can be divided can be destroyed. Is there any portion of man that is indivisible? Has man discovered any such entity in the human body?

Is this soul, which so many say is immortal, composed of many substances, as the body is, or is it composed of only one substance? Is the soul a person? Is it the I?

We may speculate on the nature of the soul and in its destiny after its earthly life is over, but in all such speculations there is no knowledge. No living person can say that the soul survives the body's death, from knowing such to be the fact.

In all the religious faith in man's immortality no believer has attempted to sketch the life of a person who is living "over there," to tell what are the habits and customs of the inhabitants of the good hereafter or of the bad hereafter. We are told that the believers in a certain religion go to heaven when they die, and that the unbelievers don't, but all the inquiries as to these destinations of human souls have elicited no reliable information as to where they are or what kind of places they are, nothing but vaporous theological generalities.

I am asked if I don't wish to live again after I die? As I have not committed suicide, I presume the fact that I am alive is pretty good evidence that I have no quarrel with existence. But as to living again, I should wish to know upon what conditions I was to have a further gift of life. If I could not have immortality without faith in the Christian superstitions, my career would be closed when the undertaker has finished his work with my dead body.

The question of man's immortality is not a religious question purely, although religion has claimed to control human destiny hereafter. Religion is not superior to Nature: religion does not confer upon man the gift of living beyond the grave. If we are to live again after we die it must be because Nature decrees it, because there is in our constitution the seeds of a future life. If religion has anything to do with man's fate beyond the grave it is only to stand by and collect a fee from the soul as it emerges from its earthly sepulchre.

Christianity cannot answer the question in regard to man's future which it raises. It pretends to a knowledge which no one possesses. The man who leaves earth with his hand in the hand of death is being led into an unknown region. Death blindfolds us, but is that all? Perhaps it puts out the eye that sees, the ear that hears, the hand that feels. So far as we can judge, it does do all this. And perhaps it ends the man, perhaps it ends the soul. When death enters our homes it writes on the cold form one word: Dead. Does it write the truth or does it write a lie?

Unbelieving Men of Science.

Up to the present time there have been no available religious statistics giving separately the views of men of science. Judging from reviews of a recent book by Dr. James H. Leuba, professor of psychology in Bryn Mawr College (Pennsylvania), the want has been in a measure supplied. Dr. Leuba has canvassed the men listed in "American Men of Science," a volume containing about 5,500 names, and in the membership lists of the American Historical Association, the American Sociological Society and the American Psychological Association.

The questions put to the men of science were calculated to draw from them an expression of their belief regarding "a God to whom one may pray in the expectation of receiving an answer" and "personal immortality for all men."

From the answers received it was found that 41.8 per cent. profess belief in the sort of God described, and that 58.2 acknowledge unbelief. So the unbelievers have a majority of 17.4 in a hundred.

As regards immortality, 50.6 affirmed their belief in it, and 49.4 rejected it.

Professor Leuba drew a distinction between the "greater men" and the "lesser men" among the historians, physical scientists, biological scientists, sociologists, and psychologists. The "lesser men" furnished the larger number of believers, in the proportion of 59.3 to 26.9, or more than two to one. It may be presumed that the "greater men," holding more commanding or secure positions, were the more frank in their statement. Seventy-two per cent. of the whole are either college professors or government employees.

Touching belief according to profession, the biologists produce a much smaller number of believers in God and immortality than the physicians. The figures are: For the believers in God, physicists, 43.9 per cent.; biologists, 30.5 per cent.; and for the believers in immortality, 50.7 per cent. against 37 per cent. Here, too, the smaller per cent. of believers is found among the greater biologists. They count only 16.9 per cent. of believers in a personal God and 25.4 per cent. of believers in immortality. As many as 59.3 per cent. of greater biologists express disbelief in God and 31.7 per cent. a disbelief in immortality.

In the analysis of Professor Leuba's statistics performed by the Philadelphia Public Ledger it appears that, with the professors of church history left out, "only about one-third of the greater historians expressed belief in God, but the number of believers among the lesser historians rose to 63 per cent., as against 48 per cent. among the lesser scientists. Forty-five per cent. of the non-believers among historians desire immortality, either moderately or intensely. The number of greater historians who do not desire immortality is nearly double that of the lesser men of the same situation."

Only 19.4 per cent. of sociologists believe in God among the "greater professors," whereas the non-academic sociologists are believers in God to the extent of 24.4 per cent. These figures are virtually the same as those for biologists and psychologists.

In the case of the psychologists alone is the number of believers in immortality less than that of the believers in God; in the other groups, the believers in immortality uniformly exceed the believers in God.

Why the greater men should be more skeptical than the lesser the professor does not attempt to explain, but he advances a theory as to the larger unbelief of the psychologists, sociologists and biologists. These, he says, have come in superior numbers "to recognize fixed orderliness in organic and psychic life, and not merely inorganic existence; while frequently physical scientists have recognized the presence of invariable law in the inorganic world only. The belief in a personal God as defined for the purpose of our investigation is, therefore, less often possible to students of psychic and of organic life than to physical scientists."

There are some physical scientists who do not recognize evolution in the case of human beings, and others who, while admitting it in man's physical development, deny that man's "soul" is, like his body, of natural origin. These classes have no necessary scientific restrictions on their beliefs, and so accepting God, immortality or anything else comes easy to them.

In his search for believers Professor Leuba included students in colleges, of whom he says:

"The student's statistics show that young people enter college possessed of the belief still accepted more or less perfunctorily, in the average home of the land, and that as their mental powers mature and their horizon widens, a large percentage of them abandon the cardinal Christian beliefs. It seems probable that on leaving college, from forty to fifty per cent. of the students with whom we are concerned deny or doubt the fundamental dogmas of the Christian religion."

The results of the inquiries, the method of which the author is confident will stand the challenge of statistical experts, are as a whole not confirmatory but contradictory of the claims of the Christian clergy and others that a majority of men of science and learning subscribe to the fundamental dogmas of the Christian religion.

There are some things that must be facts if the Christian religion is true. These are the creation and fall of man, the divine inspiration and inerrancy of the Bible, the miraculous conception and virgin birth of Jesus Christ, with his crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, and miracles. We do not think that any of these could be denied without impairing all of the others and so undermining the Christian faith; and the inquiry conducted by Dr. Leuba might have been more satisfactory had these questions been included. It is possible that he would have received fewer replies. However, the investigation is satisfactory so far as it goes, for with God and immortality left out, the rest of the faith is superstition.

We have heard it said that scientific men of this generation are not Agnostics, like Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Haeckel. There were giants in those days, and the greatest of the men of science to-day approach them nearest in their repudiation of the fundamental dogmas of the Christian religion.

Blasphemy Defense Fund.

This fund is growing, but not so rapidly as it should if it is to be closed at an early day. The matter to be used in the argument against the retention and enforcement of blasphemy laws accumulates faster in the hands of Mr. Schroeder, who is going over the whole subject, and this week treats of the competency of Blackstone, who wrote to fit an established church and the divine right of kings, to say what should be tolerated or suppressed in a secular republic.

The purpose of the fund is not especially to defend against the present prosecution of Michael Mockus in Connecticut, but rather to preserve in permanent form the argument for the doing away with the anachronism of blasphemy prosecutions altogether, and for the establishment more firmly in this country of the right of free speech.

By the time this is ended—in the Supreme Court of the United States if necessity takes it there—the indictment of the blasphemy law and of the courts that enforce it will be complete. It is decided to put the whole record in permanent form by printing it in a book for submission to the press and for deposit in libraries, so that lawyers may hereafter know at once how to attack such cases from a constitutional point of view. It is to the printing of the book, and not to legal fees or costs of court, that Freethinkers are asked to contribute.

The Free Speech League, for which Mr. Schroeder is attorney, is defending Mr. Mockus.

The extent to which the defense may be made effective in other cases depends upon the means furnished in money contributions to print and circulate the record. This is the work for which donations are asked, that Freethinkers may avail themselves of the fruit of Mr. Schroeder's labors, which are in a field not otherwise covered.

The volume will go where it will do good just to the extent that the printing fund is enlarged. Its circulation will depend on the amount raised. The contributors' names will be printed in it—a valuable feature, showing that the cause has numbers behind it, and contributors of one dollar or more will be entitled to a copy.

More Literary Felony.

Enough has been published long since (see "The Case of Billy Sunday") to show that as a literary thief the most eminent of American divines is a many times offender. He takes the products of other men's minds and sells or copyrights them as his own. This he did with Ingersoll, and with Talmage and other clergymen. Whenever his output displays beauty or eloquence, it is stolen goods. His most recently exposed theft is from a book published years ago by John Uri Lloyd of Cincinnati, containing a chapter entitled "Etidorhpa," which is Aphrodite (Venus) spelled the other way. Last month the Boston Post asked this leading American clergyman to contribute to its columns a thought on "What Christmas Means to Me," and he did so. He submitted the following (left-hand column). A few days later a Malden reader of the Post contributed an extract from the book mentioned, from the chapter "Etidorhpa," here given in the right-hand column:

SUNDAY.

THE ORIGINAL.

"Crush all the colors of the rainbow into one hue, then magnify that by infinity and you would have less beauty than Christmas means to me.

"Lighten eider down one thousand fold and then you would have less softening, soothing influences than Christmas means to me.

"Abstract the perfume from all the flowers in the world, then the fragrance would not equal what Christmas means to me.

"Gather all light cast by a troop of angels, then sprinkle the resultant beauty with star dust, mixed with diamonds, and that would not equal what Christmas means to me.

"Strike Christmas from time's record and love would become a corpse; the songs of little children would turn to snow-drifts of despair; the holiest and purest conceptions of men and women would become a mirage and heaven's most precious charms would vanish like ice in a summer sea.

"All this and more is what Christmas means to me."

Considering that Christmas with all its observances is plagiarized from its pagan authors for Christian uses, it may mean a plagiarism to the Rev. W. A. Sunday; and so he has appropriately celebrated it with one. He has travestied the praise of Venus to fit a Christian holiday. The late St. George Mivart, when called to account for being a bad Catholic, told Cardinal Vaughan that he knew of Roman Catholic gentlemen who reconciled themselves to the adoration of the Virgin by worshiping her as the goddess of venery. They at least preserved the unities, though guilty of sin in the eyes of Cardinal Vaughan; but Sunday has not. His many detections as a peddler of other men's literary property makes him a kind of homiletic "fence," doing business in stolen goods.

Forthcoming.

The new work on "Thomas Paine, the Apostle of Liberty," by John E. Remsburg, which has just closed a run of six months in THE TRUTH SEEKER, will be issued as a book of about 225 pages, to be sold in paper covers at 50 cents per copy. Owing to the extension of the volume with new matter, and in the crowded month following the holidays, the book cannot be made ready for sale at the coming Paine anniversary celebrations, but orders may be sent in at any time.

There are two sufficient reasons why Freethinkers will want this book. The first is that it is a book of tributes to Thomas Paine, and the second, that it is a book by Remsburg. About everybody worth quoting has said a good word for Paine, and more than five hundred of their tributes are here found. Again, everything that Remsburg has written or compiled is of the highest value to Freethinkers. In the matter of biblical criticism he is the Thomas Paine of our day and generation.

Order the book at any time; price 50 cents. It will be out soon.

Our Regrettable Error.

We have to confess to a miscalculation regarding the morals of the men of God.

A while ago we said that the "Clerical Round Up" would be published soon and that orders for extra copies of the paper should be given in advance. We had a collection of clippings detailing a few ministerial rascalities, and thought that at an early day we would arrange and print them. Examination of the material indicated protracted labor. A young man drafted from outside the office was hence employed to sort the cuttings, throw out the duplicates, and write down in their order with a little added persiflage, the "name, residence, denomination when known, and offense charged." He performed his task and departed. Meanwhile more clippings flowed in, and we got Franklin Steiner to reduce them to copy for the Round Up. While Steiner was on the job, another accumulation took place. The entire product of the labor so far done was then stuffed into a satchel, and carried home by us for holidays and evening work.

When the copy was at length ready for the printer, it was seen we had made a regrettable error in promising the Round Up in one number of the paper. After trimming it by casting out some fifty instances where ministers previously mentioned had appeared, as it were, in supplementary proceedings, there is still enough of the matter to make eight pages of the paper; and our devotion to the cause of clerical morality fails at a test like that. The Round Up has to be divided and continued in our next.

Government by the "Good."

This is not a government of men; this is a government of law. Under that government of law you are entitled to have reflected in the law the will of the American people, the will of the people who are going to be governed by the law, and for whose government particularly the law has been passed; and when you write on the statute books of your country a law for the government of a particular portion of the people that does not reflect their views and their sentiments, you are not governing them by law; you are governing them by the despotic power of man; you are taking away from them the rights and the liberties that their fathers fought for and maintained in the Revolutionary War. You would not do it on any other question; you could not for one minute get your consent to overthrow these great principles of government if it were not that a religious propaganda has gotten behind a political organization for the purpose of the accomplishment of a result which that organization and that propaganda believe to be for the good of humanity.

I do not question their motives; but tell me, you proponents of this legislation, is there a darker day in all history of Europe than St. Bartholomew's Day, when at the point of the sword thousands of innocent women, children, and men were murdered for what the men who were committing the murders believed was a good cause and the cause of God? Religious fanaticism, it is true; but the men who did the work believed they were right.

More than that, this idea of driving people to do what somebody else thinks is right, what somebody else thinks is moral, has debauched the world with more crimes than any other despotic action by dominant government. Even in as late a day and as enlightened a time as the era when William Shakespeare wrote his plays men's lives and liberties were endangered, threatened, and destroyed in old England if they refused to accept the Protestant faith, instead of the faith of some other church. For centuries legislation was enacted to force by the dominant power of government control of the spiritual life of men, and it was not until our great Government was established and it was written in the pages of the Constitution of the United States that a man might worship his God according to the dictates of his own conscience, that efforts to control the spiritual life of men by force and by law were abandoned and given up, until to-day in all the civilized countries of the world no man for a moment would proclaim that the spiritual life of other men should be governed by his will or by his dictates, although I have no doubt there are men living within the bounds of the United States who would enact laws of that kind to-day if they had the power and the Constitution did not guard us against them. But although we have abandoned as a relic of barbarism and a relic of the Dark Ages of the past the effort to control by law the spiritual life of men, we are attempting to do the same thing and control their physical life under the claim that their spiritual welfare needs it.—Senator Underwood of Alabama, in Congress Dec. 22.

Missionary Department.

OPEN LETTER TO THE "INDEPENDENT."

In your issue of December 25 you show the humor of retaining the commandment about coveting one's neighbor's ox or ass, which have been supplanted by the automobile. You also have the courage to say that it is high time to abandon the "affectedness about 'cutting up the Bible' and destroying the beauty of the King James classic." You deprecate the superstition of medieval times and quote a condensed decalogue, and imply that Jehovah was not a model Heavenly Father.

We infer that you do not believe the scriptures to be literally true, but we are uncertain whether or not you consider the Bible the inspired word of God in some way different from other literature. Your paper is among the best and most progressive publications in the world, and you undoubtedly realize that religion should progress along with other conceptions, but you may be ignorant of some of the following facts:

1. Almost every idea in the Bible is taken from earlier writings and traditions. The creation, fall of man, deeds of Samson, miraculous birth, atonement, resurrection, ascension, etc., were all known before the Bible authors reacted them.

2. The Bible was written by men, translated by men, canonized by vote of men, and is too full of discrepancies to have been inspired.

3. The Four Gospels—practically the sole history of Jesus Christ—were not written by eye witnesses, but by unknown men, thirty to one hundred years after the death of Christ.

If these statements are true, is not Christianity a superstition?

We intend to print a subscription blank to enclose with sample copies or with books, and wish to give three good reasons why the non-subscriber should come into the fold. Can you improve on the following reasons for taking THE TRUTH SEEKER?

1. It deserves support from those who believe in freedom of thought and speech.
2. It is interesting.
3. It destroys false doctrines and hypocrisy.

Address the Missionary Editor, and if you have recently been a member of a religious denomination, it might be helpful to hear the process of your enlightenment, not for publication.

You remember the old ditty:
"If I were an alligator on the banks of Timbuctoo.
I would eat a missionary, skin and bones and hymn-book too."

Well, that is not a past danger. The street speaker on Freethought is in danger of being stoned; the man who discredits the Bible is in danger of a trial for blasphemy, and an unfair trial at that; and the churchman who expresses a liberal view is in danger of social and financial ostracism. The more a truthful paper is circulated, the sooner the general public will dare to speak and act the truth. We have sometimes thought of having a bill introduced in the legislature something as follows: "Any newspaper or other periodical that wilfully misrepresents the facts shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

If we can get no comfort from what people know, let us avoid being driven to despair by what they do not know.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

A JUDICIAL IDOL UPSET.

Denial of the Authority of Judge Blackstone to Interpret Our Constitutions.

By THEODORE SCHROEDER.

Judges are the evolutionary successors of the priest and of those who ordered the affairs of men for the rulers by divine right. Yet judges are human, quite human. This means that sometimes they are overworked, and, quite as often perhaps, are just a little bit indolent. These human qualities imply that sometimes they may be content to solve a large problem by misusing a phrase which has associations giving the atmosphere of "authority." The process is to dissociate it from its original setting, and so misapply it to inappropriate facts. This is made easily possible because the chosen sentence or paragraph expresses to the uncritical mind something which seems so obviously true as to preclude inquiry as to how small a part of the truth is really expressed, or how doubtful is its legitimate application to the new conditions.

I suspect that it has been by such process that several of our courts have come to accept Blackstone as an authority on the meaning of freedom of speech and of the press, as that is guaranteed in our American Constitutions. The present purpose is to point out the error of such a procedure in the hope of correcting it.

Blackstone an Expositor, Not a Philosopher.

To this end we need to remind ourselves that Blackstone's legitimate rôle was that of an expositor and juridical historian. He did not attempt to make any original contribution to the philosophy of law, nor pretend to point out the road of progress. He was never guilty of attempting a reform. This was especially true as to his comments upon freedom of speech and press. He reported all the current and some of the past abridgements of intellectual freedom, and expressed his satisfaction with things as they were. This task and this attitude of mind gave him no capacity for speaking with authority on the meaning of that larger mental liberty contended for by those whose claims were subsequently conceded and guaranteed by the American constitutions.

Even in 1804 an English Lord Chancellor protested against the misuse of the great commentator: "I am always sorry to hear Mr. Justice Blackstone's Commentaries cited as an authority. He would have been sorry himself to hear the book so cited. He did not consider it such." (Shanon v. Shanon, 1 Schoales & Lefroy's Ch. R. 324-327.) The proof of this is to be found in a footnote by Blackstone, placed at the end of his introduction to the fourth edition. Others have also questioned Blackstone's accuracy as a commentator.

For the purpose of this argument, we may agree that, as a mere reporter of juridical events, Blackstone possesses a high order of accuracy and utility. It does not follow that, if he leaves the task of a historian or an expositor, to express an opinion upon controversial matters of policy, his opinion upon the latter is entitled to any weight beyond that which his assigned reasons can supply. To illustrate, we may accept as true what Blackstone says about the law concerning witchcraft without giving any of the weight of authority to his personal endorsement of the witchcraft delusion. (Book 4, p. 60.) Likewise, we may agree that he has accurately reported the abridgements of intellectual freedom which existed under English law, without accepting his personal endorsement of the current practice as expressing the whole end and aim of those agitators for a larger intellectual liberty who succeeded in having their views about free speech written in our constitutions. We may agree that Blackstone accurately reported the law as it was, without acting as though his opinions, which were so sympathetic with and expressive of those of the English Tories, are any authority as interpretive of our more democratic constitutions.

Blackstone Anti-republican.

In the beginnings of our country, Blackstone was almost the only law book read. It is said that there were more sets of his Commentaries in America than in England. Jefferson laments that "Blackstone is to us what the Alcoran is to the Mahometans." (Vol. xii, Writings of Thomas Jefferson, p. 392, Library Edition.) Again Jefferson says: "The exclusion from the courts of the malign influence of all authorities after the Georgium sidus became ascendant, would uncanonize Blackstone." (Vol. xiii, Writings of Thomas Jefferson, p. 166, Library Edition.) And a reason why this might not be regrettable is that "Blackstone and Hume have made Tories of all England, and are making Tories of those young Americans whose native feelings of independence do not place them above the wily sophistries of a Hume or a Blackstone." (Vol. xiv, Writings of Thomas Jefferson, p. 120, Library Edition.)

After quoting Blackstone's doctrine of the absolute sovereignty of the king, the Supreme Court of the United States makes this comment: "This last position is only a branch of a much more extensive principle on which a plan of systematic despotism has been lately formed in England, and prosecuted with unwearied assiduity and care. Of this plan the author of the Commentaries was, if not the introducer, at least the great supporter. He has been followed in it by writers later and less known; and his doctrines have, both on the other and this side of the Atlantic, been implicitly and generally received by those who examine neither their principles nor their consequences. That principle is, that all human law must be prescribed by a superior. This principle I mean now to examine. Suffice it at present to say, that another principle, very different in its nature and operations, forms, in my judgment, the basis of sound and genuine jurisprudence; laws derived from the pure source of equality and justice must be founded on the consent of those whose obedience they require. The sovereign when traced to his source must be found in the man." (Chisholm v. Georgia, 1 U. S. 419-458.)

Even an English Court as early as 1784 has told us that "Mr. Justice Blackstone, we all know, was an anti-republican lawyer." (King v. Shipley, Dean of Asaph, 4 Douglas 73-172-3.) And yet some Americans are impelled to forget that when Blackstone was describing liberty of the press under a system of what he conceived as an absolute monarchy, he was describing only a limited intellectual liberty permission. They forget also that Blackstone's opponents demanded an unabridged intellectual liberty as a conceded and constitutionally guaranteed right. These latter views, not those of Blackstone, were written into our constitutions. When our courts forget this they use Blackstone's views as interpretive of our constitutions instead of absolute monarchy.

Those authors not on the judicial bench are less restrained in their utterances of condemnation than are the judges. In order that Blackstone may be duly uncanonized, it becomes necessary to quote also a few professional critics who are not constrained by judicial etiquette. One of the most influential libertarians who took issue with Blackstone was Jeremy Bentham. He intimates in Blackstone the existence of "a resolution to justify everything at any rate, and to disapprove of nothing. . . . [He] stands forth as the professed champion of religious intolerance; or openly sets his face against all civil reformation." (Fragments on Government.)

Mr. John Austin, one of the founders of the analytic school of jurists, in addition to voluminous concrete criticism, makes this general indictment against Blackstone: "He owed the popularity of his book to a paltry but effectual artifice, and to a poor, superficial merit. He truckled to the sinister interests and to the mischievous prejudices of power; and he flattered the overweening conceit of their national or peculiar institutions which then was devoutly entertained by the body of the English people, though now it is happily vanishing before the advancement of reason. And to his paltry but effectual artifice he added the allurements of a style which is fitted to tickle the ear." (Albany Law Journal, vol. viii, p. 290, quoting Austin's Lectures on Jurisprudence, 3d ed., vol. i, p. 71; or vol. i, p. 69, ed. of 1911.)

Mr. Rice, author of a book on "The Law of Evidence," has written a searching criticism under the title, "The Blackstone Craze." In it he says: "Especially is it in order . . . to refer to the vigorous protest of two distinguished former occupants of the New York Appellate Bench, who based their aversion to Blackstone, first, on account of its utter uselessness as a repository of existing law; and second, because of its direct inculcation of vicious doctrines that have been wholly repudiated, and yet leave upon the impressionable mind of the student the contour of a false theory that is apt to infest and hamper much of his subsequent research."

"It is a rank and driving insult to the common intelligence of our profession even to refer to the major portion of Blackstone's Commentaries as affording even a feeble exposition of the modern law. Whole chapters devoted to the ecclesiastical and governmental policy of Great Britain have not even a nebulous bearing upon any rule whatever in vogue in this country; and in fact they have long been superseded by elaborate works on the British constitution that have been out of print for half a century. What species of mental leprosy will still insist upon feeding legal minds upon such Blackstonian druff as is found in his chapters on Benefit of Clergy . . . and particularly the chapters on English Criminal Law?"

"Summarizing the contention . . . we may be allowed to say that a course of study that aims at the laborious exposition of principles of law that have lost their efficacy or application . . . of criminal laws that are a smear alike upon our civilization, our humanity and our common sense, is . . . an imposition upon practical methods, a prostitution of practical energy." (Frank S. Rice, "The Blackstone Craze," Columbia Law Times, vol. vi, p. 1.)

"It has become quite the fashion to depreciate the study of Blackstone's Commentaries, on the ground that they are 'the charnel-house of dead law.'" (Albany Law Journal, vol. viii, p. 290.)

Another critic, Mr. Reuben E. Sears, adds this: "It is this adoration of his for the then dominant feeling of society that makes him (in his fourth book) the servile apologist of Charles I . . . that makes him brand the judges . . . as 'military hypocrites and enthusiasts'; that leads him to say that the penalties for speaking in derogation of the Established Church are 'not too severe and intolerant'; that prompts him to exhibit his ideas of a merciful Providence when he tells us that these penalties 'proved a principal means, under Providence, of preserving the purity as well as decency of the national worship.'"

"He tramples on the right of private judgment. He insults our understanding. He tells us that those who act in opposition to the Established Church 'cannot be prompted by any laudable motive,' not even 'by a mistaken zeal for reformation'; that their arguments are 'the virulent declamations of peevish and opinionated men,' and 'calculated for no other purpose than merely to disturb the consciences and poison the minds of the people.'"

"Thus, in an age when the great principles of civil and religious liberty were being so strongly agitated which are now so well established, he stands forth the professional champion of religious intolerance, the determined opponent of civil reformation. He records the abominable laws against Dissenters and Papists, by which they are, in effect, deprived of nearly all civil rights, and then adds: 'Everything is as it should be.'"

"Thus, he treats with scorn those glorious, all-enduring principles for which Huss and Jerome went to the stake; for which honest-hearted Luther waged his long warfare against the Romish church; for which Zwingle, fired with the spirit of Swiss liberty, poured out his life-blood on the heights of Cappel; the same principles which were sanctified by the suffering zeal of Hooper and Latimer; the same principles for which glorious Pym and valiant Hampden offered their heroic resistance to the tyrannic encroachments of Charles I, and whose independent sentiments were made to be respected and triumphant by the invincible Ironsides, of lion-hearted Cromwell at Marston Moor, Naseby and Worcester; the same principles which lost to James II his throne, and placed thereon the courageous Prince of Orange; the same principles for which our Revolutionary sires fought so nobly and won so gloriously; which in our own country again, and in our own times, have been so honorably vindicated—the eternal and immutable principles of civil and religious liberty." (William Blackstone, in Western Jurist, vol. v, p. 529, 1871.)

"It is true Blackstone in the later editions of his works somewhat modified his expressions in regard to the Toleration Act and the offenses against the Established Church. Yet by a subtle use of rhetorical expletives, he has left the meaning the same as at first, or else left no meaning at all. This led Bentham to say that our author had been made 'to sophisticate, even expunge, but all the doctors in the world would not bring him to confession.'"

My researches have failed to uncover one single writer who has combined both the inclination and the courage to say that Blackstone was even in the least degree qualified to interpret our American democratic constitutions. Not even those judges who read into our constitutions Blackstone's conception of liberty of the press have dared to face a consideration of his fitness to be accepted for such an authority.

Blackstone and General Liberty.

Of course Blackstone had to justify blasphemy laws because his assumed task was to defend the absolute sovereignty of the ruling caste. Literary talent alone could never have given him distinguished political preferment. But his great literary ability, devoted to the unflinching defence of every existing tyranny, contributed mightily toward his development from a pauper orphan to a celebrated public functionary, whose official acts contributed absolutely nothing to his fame. (But for an interesting and sympathetic account of Blackstone's career see Charles B. Wheeler, "Blackstone the Lawyer and the Man," University of Cal. Publications, vol. xii; Univ. Chronicle, pp. 323-349.)

We can best understand the value of Blackstone's conception of toleration if we see it in relation to his more general philosophy of government. He says: "This law of nature being coeval with mankind, and dictated by God himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. It is binding over all the globe and in all countries, and at all times; no human laws are of any validity if contrary to this; . . . Upon these two foundations, the law of nature and the law of revelation, depend all human laws." (Vol. i, p. 42.)

From such a theory of government he must of course believe in laws against blasphemy, and, like our own Puritans, he could no doubt quote the revealed will of God in support. However, some American judges, in harmony with our American conception of a secular state, have said that "reason and the nature of things will impose laws even on the Deity." (Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87-143.) Austin calls the most probable interpretation of the foregoing quotations from Blackstone "sheer nonsense." (Austin's Lectures on Jurisprudence, sec. 174.) Having such a medieval conception of the nature and origin of civil law, it was inevitable that Blackstone should also have a similar view of personal liberty.

To make it plain just how true all these criticisms are, if we view Blackstone from a democratic and libertarian viewpoint, it would be necessary to present a volume in critical review of his commentaries. Manifestly, this cannot be done here. The authors quoted above have performed that task in part, and yet not thoroughly from the viewpoints of which I am speaking.

Those who are familiar with English history during the period just preceding our American revolution will know how to gauge the import of the following brief quotations from the Commentaries. Space limits forbid the reproduction of more: Blackstone exhibits his great devotion to tyranny by his extravagant praise of it under the name of liberty. He says that the "idea and practice of political and religious liberty flourish in their highest vigor in these kingdoms, where it falls little short of perfection." (Vol. i, p. 126.)

"All these rights and liberties it is our birthright to enjoy entire; unless where the laws of our country have laid them under necessary restraints—restraints in themselves so gentle and moderate as will appear upon further inquiry that no man of sense or probity would wish to see them slackened. For all of us have it in our choice to do everything that a good man would desire to do; and are restrained from nothing but what would be pernicious either to ourselves or our fellow citizens." (Vol. i, p. 140.)

No man is an authoritative interpreter of our democratic and constitutional rights who cannot give them a more sympathetic understanding than is possible to a man capable of penning the foregoing paragraphs. Blackstone did not, nor did he attempt it, because the constitutions had not come into existence when he wrote, and he was incapable of sympathy with the spirit and ideals which called them into being.

Blackstone on Free Speech.

The one paragraph on freedom of the press which our Courts have cited, and the sentiment of which has been appropriated by others of them without credit to Blackstone is the following, which is quite in accord with his general defense and love of tyranny.

"In this, and in other instances which we have lately considered, where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious or scandalous libels are punished by the English law, some with greater, others with less degrees of severity, the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated."

"The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraint upon publication, and not in freedom of censure for criminal matter when published. Every free man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser, as was formerly done both before and since the revolution, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion and government. But to punish, as the law does at present, any dangerous or offensive writings which, when published, shall on a fair and impartial trial, be adjudged of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order of government and religion, the only solid foundations of civil liberty." (Com. vol. iv, p. 151.)

As far as it can be done by a mere abstract statement of the law, Blackstone has given us a good portrayal of the various modes of restraining free speech for the protection of the prerogatives of royalty and the privileges of aristocracy. Usually this was the real object of censorship, even when the pretense was to protect religion, morality, God and peace. When our judges accept Blackstone as an authority on the meaning and limits of constitutional free speech, they overlook one very important fact, namely: the only occasion for our constitutional phrases upon the subject was the desire to make it impossible for our legislators to re-enact those English laws against free speech which Blackstone approved.

In other words, our constitutions were never intended to endorse Mansfield, Kenyon, Ellenborough, Blackstone or any other Tory-Royalist conception of free speech. On the contrary, our constitutional guarantees were meant to register the fact that these English judicial conceptions of free speech had been overruled by the American people.

If Blackstone's paragraph above quoted is an authority upon the meaning of unabridged liberty, then he is equally an authority on the meaning of our constitutional guarantees for a separation of church and state. Thus, by the easy device of a Blackstonian interpretation of our constitutional guarantees of freedom, we may revive, not only the laws against Catholics, impostors, Nonconformists and heretics, but also those legally establishing a favored church. Here also Blackstone gave his endorsement. To show this I am going to quote Blackstone again. This time I will quote the first edition:

"Everything is now as it should be [says Blackstone, Book IV, ch. iv, p. 49, ed. of 1769] unless perhaps that heresy ought to be more strictly defined, and no prosecution permitted, even in the ecclesiastical courts, till the tenets in question are by proper authority previously declared to be heretical. Under these restrictions, it seems necessary, for the support of the National Religion, that the officers of the Church should have power to censure heretics, but not to exterminate or destroy them."

To punish seditious utterances by boring a hole through the tongue with a red hot iron, as was lawful in Maryland, or to inflict the same punishment for denying the resurrection of the body, as was lawful in Massachusetts, does not involve either previous restraint or complete extermination. These, therefore, are in complete harmony with unabridged freedom of speech, "properly understood," as by Blackstone and by those American courts which accept him as an authority on constitutional liberty of speech and press.

Shall we now believe that a separation of church and state and religious equality mean only that heretics ought no longer to be destroyed or burnt? Is that not just as sensible as to accept Blackstone as an authority on the meaning of free speech or the existence of witches?

It is hoped that the foregoing considerations have much impaired Blackstone's torism as an authority on the meaning of our free speech guarantees. Later will be exhibited the contrary views of Blackstone's critics. Then it will be claimed that it was the opinions of the friends of intellectual liberty and not Blackstone's that were meant to be expressed in our constitutional guarantees of free speech. Likewise it will be contended that their opinions shall be used as an authoritative interpretation of the constitutional language, and that Blackstone's definition shall be disregarded.

The Virgin Birth a Forgery.

The following is taken from a New York daily paper:

"Philadelphia, Dec. 28—At the meeting of Biblical savants at Haverford College to-day it was declared that the original manuscripts of the Bible contained no foundation for the belief in the virgin birth.

"Prof. Benjamin W. Bacon of Yale University was the speaker and he made the statement while reading a paper entitled 'The Quotation in Matthew i. 23: Behold, a virgin shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel.'

"Prof. Bacon said there were two principal versions of the story—one that Joseph was the father of Jesus, and the other, now almost universally accepted, of the virgin birth.

"There is no basis for believing the latter version, he said, for the Bible as now printed was the result of much working over by Biblical editors and through their various interpretations of original manuscripts had come into many confusions.

"This practice was generally followed, said Professor Bacon, and out of the editorial confusion came often more a desire to write a good story than arrive at the truth. That, Professor Bacon believed, was how the virgin birth story came about. He said he had examined the original manuscripts of the Bible and could find nothing to bear out the truth of the story."

If Prof. Bacon is right, if it is really true that the original manuscript of the New Testament does not mention the virgin birth of Jesus, what is left of orthodox Christianity and how much truth can be found in the printed Christian Bible? If the editors of the Bible were more concerned with the "desire to write a good story" than with an effort to "arrive at the truth," the Christians are basing their faith on a forgery. Let us not forget that Prof. Bacon's statement was made not before a society of Freethinkers, but at a meeting of "Biblical savants," and its object was not to spread Infidelity and to undermine the foundation of Christian faith. But with the story of the virgin birth left out, how can Christians assert that Jesus was God or the son of God? In a recent harangue in Boston, Billy Sunday said that Christ was either the son of God or the son of a Jewish harlot. Of course, from the standpoint of orthodox Christianity it does not make the slightest difference whether Joseph, the carpenter, was the father of Jesus or some unknown man. If orthodox Christianity can swallow one story, it might as well swallow the other without making a wry face. If Jesus was a man, the sexual morality of his mother is a matter of no consequence to us. If Jesus was a real man, not a god or a myth, and if his life and teachings are of any use to the world, we are interested in the man Jesus, not in his father or his mother, as he was not responsible for his parents. His mother might have been a tower of virtue or a totally depraved woman—can this add to or detract from the value of his teachings, presuming that his teachings are of any value?

There is another thing worthy of consideration. If the story of the virgin birth is a forgery, do the stories of the crucifixion and resurrection, as given in the printed Bible, correspond with the text of the manuscript? May it not possibly be that these were also good editorial stories, but written with no desire to arrive at the truth? Prof. Bacon's statement discredits the New Testament, and it is curious to know what orthodox Christians will say on the subject. CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

"Revelation" vs. Truth.

Koran or Septuagint, Talmud or Bible,
Scholars for centuries through them may look,
Missing this truth—let who will think it libel:
God's will was never revealed in a book.

Line up your armies, O civilized nations,
Call on your priests their high office to fill;
Never an altar had richer oblations—
Men and boys sacrificed, led out to kill.

Thus through long years yet to come shall ye find it,
Kings, born to wealth, without mercy or ruth,
Till there be heard—Reason's power behind it—
Man's voice proclaiming the message of Truth.

Not in a church with its sky-piercing steeple,
Built for some man-devised doctrine's defense,
But in the lives, hearts and minds of the people,
Teaching the Gospel of sound common sense.

This, then, the reason man slaughters his brother;
Hate, discord, strife that religion has wrought;
Man-made religion, he knoweth no other,
Weird superstitions for centuries taught.

Koran or Septuagint, Talmud or Bible,
Cannot endure Reason's keen, searching look;
This is the truth—let who will think it libel—
God's will was never revealed in a book.

WILLIAM B. DELANCEY.

The bad thing about all religions is that, instead of being able to confess their allegorical nature, they have to conceal it; accordingly they parade their doctrines in all seriousness as true in a particular sense; and as absurdities form an essential part of these doctrines, you have the great mischief of a continual fraud. And, what is worse, the day arrives when they are no longer true in a particular sense, and then there is an end of them; so that, in that respect, it would be better to admit their allegorical nature at once. But the difficulty is to teach the multitude that something can be both true and untrue at the same time. And as all religions are in a greater or less degree of this nature, we must recognize the fact that mankind cannot go on without a certain amount of absurdity, that absurdity is an element in its existence, and illusion indispensable; as indeed other aspects of life testify.—Arthur Schopenhauer.

There are some people so constituted that there is no room in the heaven of their minds for the butterflies and moths of fancy to spread their wings. Everything is taken in solemn and stupid earnest. Such men would hold Shakespeare responsible for what Falstaff said about "sack," and for Mrs. Quickly's notions of propriety: There is an old Greek saying which is applicable here: "In the presence of human stupidity, even the gods stand helpless."—Robert G. Ingersoll.

The more powerful the obstacle, the more glory we shall have in overcoming it; and the difficulties with which we are met are the maids of honor which set off virtue.—Molière.

History and the Anointed One.

Having read with more than ordinary interest the articles of David Eccles and others on the "Historicity of Jesus" I would like to make a few remarks not so much with the intent to enter into the discussion as to call the attention of the controvertists to some facts, having an important bearing on the question at issue, which appear to have been overlooked by both sides.

My idea is to keep the record straight, though the Jesus of Mr. Eccles will not satisfy the orthodox any more than he will holders of the myth theory. I want to call attention to the fact that we have no reliable history antedating very much the time of printing, that while we may place some reliance in the general outlines of the events of nations before that time there is still so much of myth and miracle woven into it as real happenings that we can discard all that part of the so-called history and still retain a fair outline of universal events. I want to call attention to the fact that we have no copies of the classics or church fathers antedating the eighth century of our era, and no copy of the Jewish Bible antedating the tenth or eleventh century; and while the Christians claim to have copies of the New Testament written in the third and fourth centuries, we are safe in giving them a date no earlier than the eighth or tenth century.

What real gain is there in arguing about myths of any kind, and especially about those for which no historical documents can be quoted that were written within eight hundred years of the date set for the life of the mythical person?

Then, too, Jesus and Joshua are the same words, and our translators are dishonest in giving us Joshua in one place and Jesus in another. Joshua is a common Jewish name and Jesus is the Greek form of it. Will Mr. Eccles tell us, in view of these facts, why he even thinks he has the shadow of reason to believe that "Jesus" ever lived? As the matter stands, is it not more logical and reasonable to believe that "Jesus" is merely a rehash of the old sun myth? It fits all the requirements of the old myth, at any rate.

What have we gained if we accept Mr. Eccles' theories? Are we not much better off and in a more logical position holding the myth theory?

G. S. LINCOLN, M.D.

For Halls of Reason.

Beneath the Father Sun or Starry Dome is the first and natural hall, school or platform for the dissemination of truth. Nature is the home of truth.

Close to nature are hillsides, the groves, the lakesides, the roadsides, the camps, the crossroads and the curbstone forums of our larger cities. Freedom dwells in the open.

But there are winter storms and weeping skies, and they should never be permitted unnecessarily to delay the intellectual emancipation of the human family.

In these turbulent times it is not wise to imitate the costly heathen temples. The poor shelter of tents or barracks serves in an emergency. A sky-piercing steeple often serves to conceal the truth and to distract and thus spoil the aim of reason. A meeting house or hall made of boughs would better serve our purpose in very rural districts.

A little shelter is better than none—a beginning means much.

There must be no delay, for the times are ripe and conditions unprecedentedly urgent.

The great war of Christendom is an object lesson that all the world must heed. The utter failure of any kind of religion to protect and save never before was so much in evidence.

Reason with solid foundations in scientific truth is the only promise for the future.

Plain halls, economically constructed, with inexpensive material, seats and platforms, good roofs and plenty of light, enough and to spare, radiating to the pilgrims groping around in the outside darkness, constitute the essentials.

Truth does not require so costly embellishments as faith. Once recognized, it is one with the universal truth that stands alone.

Credulity, deceived by appearances, chases phantoms.

Investigation finds the right way. Our meeting house is not a temple, but a workshop. It seeks and distributes pure facts.

If we begin within our means the initial enthusiasm will increase with the more permanent growth. The good work will thrive by new results of further research.

Understanding the ever enlarging known will check the foolish worship of the unknown.

Conditions differ as to locating our halls to good advantage, but the many advantages possessed by outlying sites near great cities it might be well to consider. These are yet obtainable within five-cent carfare limit, in residence districts, or in pleasant spots for outings, where you will like to go yourself, take your family and invite friends and neighbors.

Another not! Do not wait for some rich brother to bequeath the money, but workers, farmers, merchants, everybody, help in small amounts, material, labor, according to means. Then all will feel more interest in it. It will be theirs. The great cause will be theirs, and its Hall of Reason, its associations, its school, its platform, its library, its reading room, its general usefulness and scientific work. It will have strong personal appeal, clearing the way to right living, better health and broad enlightenment.

In case a contribution box should be found necessary as a financial aid, motives would be less likely to be misconstrued if it were made in the image of Paine's "Age of Reason," and it would serve as a reminder of the habitual unselfishness of its great author and his courageous humanitarianism.

The initiative points the way to accomplishment.

The way to begin is to begin.

Keep trying. Never give up.

Freedom is born of reason and true science.

Science and Freethought are twins.

GEORGE W. MOREHOUSE.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 9 we reprinted from the New York Times of Nov. 12 an inquiry regarding Lincoln's religion which inferred that the martyred President was a Christian, and the reply of Mr. van der Weyde, in the Times of Nov. 26, quoting William H. Herndon, Lincoln's law partner for many years, Col. Ward H. Lamon, a close friend and confidant of the President, and John G. Nicolay, Lincoln's private secretary, all biographers of Lincoln and all of whom confirmed the testimony that Lincoln was not a believer in Christianity.

Mr. van der Weyde's letter (submitted under the initials "M. V. W.") elicited replies from three Christians who contended that Lincoln was a believer in Christianity and from one Freethinker (or Deist?). Their four letters were published in the Times and then Mr. van der Weyde rejoined as follows:

From the New York Times, December 24.

Commenting upon the four letters published in these columns December 10 concerning the religion of Abraham Lincoln, "M. V. W." again writes:

Of your four correspondents, "A. K.," W. J. Black, "A. B. L." and William Arthur Thomas, only one ("A. K.") seems to have really understood Lincoln's religious views. The others have certainly not delved deep into Lincoln's religious thought, nor are they familiar with the world's various forms of faith. Lincoln was, as "A. K." asserts, a Deist, believing, as did Thomas Paine, Voltaire, Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin, in a God or Supreme Being, but disbelieving in the Bible as "inspired" or anything other than the work of man. The three correspondents who quote speeches of Lincoln in which he refers to the Deity do not differentiate between simple belief in God and belief in Christianity. They unthinkingly infer that because Lincoln alludes to God he was a believer in the Bible—in the Christian system of religion. They have not remembered that all religions have a Deity. None of the three correspondents produces in evidence any speech or letter of Lincoln that supports the contention that Lincoln was a believer in Christianity, nor can they, for no such speech or letter exists. Lincoln, as all the evidence shows, believed just as did Thomas Paine, author of "The Age of Reason," who in the introductory remarks to that work, says:

"I believe in one God and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe in the equality of man, and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy. But lest it should be supposed that I believe many other things in addition to these, I shall in the progress of this work, declare the things I do not believe, and my reasons for not believing them. I do not believe in the creed professed by the Jewish Church, by the Roman Church, by the Greek Church, by the Turkish Church, by the Protestant Church, nor by any Church that I know of. My own mind is my own church. All national institutions of churches—whether Jewish, Christian, or Turkish—appear to me no other than human inventions set up to terrify and enslave mankind and monopolize power and profit."

Lincoln's writings would indicate that he was probably a close student of both Paine's theological and political works. His religious ideas coincide with those of Paine.

The dictionary defines Deist as "one who believes in the existence of God, but not in revealed religion." Lincoln as a Deist merely believed in one God—Nature's God—but had no faith in any of the creeds. That he believed in a Deity is undisputed. His two inaugural addresses, his messages to Congress, his proclamations, his speeches include reference to "God," "Beneficent Creator," "Ruler of the Universe," "Almighty Father," etc. All Deists would use such terms. But to try to convince any person who knows something of religions—and of Lincoln—that because he refers to the Deity he is therefore a Christian (i. e., a believer in the Bible) is evidence of extreme thoughtfulness.

Ever since Lincoln's death Christian zealots have been trying, despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, to make Lincoln out a Christian. Always they have evidence to offer, always it is the same evidence, that Lincoln in his speeches, etc., has referred to God. It is the same evidence that your three correspondents now offer, and I submit that as evidence of Lincoln's Christianity it is valueless.

"A. B. I." says that Lincoln's Thanksgiving proclamation "does not sound as if he were an unbeliever, skeptic, or infidel, or that Lincoln's ideas in any way resemble Voltaire's." "A. B. I." has evidently never read Voltaire's writings on religion. He understands the words "unbeliever, skeptic, and infidel" to mean disbelief in God; it does not occur to him that all three words may justly be used by the Christian referring to the Deist's rejection of the Bible.

William Arthur Thomas so completely misunderstood my assertion that Lincoln was not a believer in Christianity that in his letter to The Times he refers to testimonies I adduced "to prove the Great Emancipator an Atheist." An Atheist is exactly the opposite of what Lincoln was, a Deist.

The evidence presented concerning Lincoln's religious views by his eminent biographers, William H. Herndon, Colonel Ward H. Lamon, and John G. Nicolay, all intimate friends of Lincoln (the former his law partner from 1843 to the date of the President's death, the latter his private secretary), is incontrovertible. "Lincoln was an infidel and so died."

The Federal Council of Churches, representing thirty denominations, has held a six days' session at St. Louis, during which "differentiating doctrines and ecclesiastical distinctions were rigidly held in the background." The proceedings will fill seven volumes and the main section is devoted to "the clarion call to the new task of the church, that, namely, of Christianizing international relations." There they go again, claiming that peace between nations can be secured by Christianity whose advocates refuse to meet the tenets of their own creeds in a straightforward manner. All work for peace is good; but, when it comes, let not the followers of Jehovah claim that it was their doing. Christianizing relations between nations would mean that each should sacrifice itself for the others, which is contrary to human nature. Rationalizing such relations would mean adjusting differences so that none would suffer to such an extent as they do by war.

Stating that "peace is the triumph of righteousness, and not the mere sheathing of the sword," a large number of clergymen and churchmen have signed an address to the nation warning one and all against a premature peace in Europe that "may be a curse instead of a blessing." But all blessings depend upon peace. Apparent blessings, or any conceived of "righteousness," that result from war are the illegitimate proceeds of murder and arson. The notion of "no peace without righteousness" has been the warrant for centuries of slaughter, from "the blood of Zacharias" to that of Abraham Lincoln, and onward. The program of these churchmen provides for neither peace nor righteousness, only the unsheathed sword, which is the assassin of both.

A correspondent sends the following religious notice, from the Chicago Heights (Ill.) Signal, in the hope that it will "make a hit with us." It does. We quote: "Last Sunday was a great day in the Nazarene church. The meeting became so interesting the pastor forgot to take up the morning offering. At class meeting at 6:30 Pentecost struck the people. Some cried, some started, some run, some sung. The house was filled with God's glory. The pastor preached, subject, 'Turn Ye Backsliders.' At the close of the sermon four suckers came to the altar. L. G. Milby, pastor."

The Socialist mayor of Schenectady, New York, may have attempted the enforcement of the Sunday law against moving picture theatricals for the purpose of bringing the law into disrepute. If so, he has succeeded, for theatre owners who were arrested have been acquitted by a jury, and an injunction has been secured to prevent him from further interference with Sunday exhibitions. Mayor Lunn bases his action on the decision of the Appellate Division at Albany, that movies are forbidden by the Sunday law, although the law was passed before there were any movies.

The courts of the state of Washington have decided that Paul Haffer, a Socialist, must serve a three months jail sentence for referring to the fact that George Washington used liquor and profanity and held slaves. If everyone who should thus speak of the Revolutionary heroes were to be treated accordingly, there would not be jails enough to hold the ministers, including the Rev. W. A. Sunday, who have made damaging accusations against Thomas Paine. Washington's memory is not more "sacred" than Paine's. Have not all the heroic dead an equal right to protection?

THE CLERICAL ROUND UP

A More or Less Incomplete List of Members of the Christian Ministry Against Whom Charges of Crime or Misconduct Have Been Laid Since Last Report.

While the clergy, Catholic and Protestant, do not admit that morality saves anybody hereafter, they are accustomed to insist that religion is its bulwark. "Without religion," says Cardinal Gibbons, "there can be no morality," and so in the pious mind irreligion and immorality are closely associated. The men who are named in this partial list of clerical delinquents are representative teachers of religion—men who, as a religious paper has said, expend so much energy in phrasing morality that they have none to devote to the practice of it. The accumulation is taken from newspaper clippings forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER in the past year or so. Some are undated, but they all belong, it is believed, to the years 1915-16, mostly '16. Each paragraph gives, in their order, so far as is known, the name, residence, denomination and offense charged.

Abbott, Rev. C. C., La Cygne, Kans. Methodist. Sending improper letters to a Sunday school teacher.

Several months previously the Rev. Abbott had separated himself from his wife and five children. Bound over to the federal grand jury.

Afflerbaugh, Rev., Grand Island, Neb. Disorderly conduct; convicted.

This preacher broke up the services being held at the funeral of Miss Gertrude Allen. In his defense the Rev. Afflerbaugh said that when God called him to speak, he would speak.

Allen, Rev. W. T., San Jose, Cal. Spiritualist. Enticing a young woman; jailed.

The Spiritualist ministry is the third one that the Rev. Mr. Allen has entered. Previously he was a Christian and then Methodist, and he has had a wife, now divorced, for each denomination.

Aurand, Rev. Chas. M., Selins Grove, Pa. Lutheran. Forgery.

He was found dead in his home, under what the press calls "mysterious circumstances," a few hours after being confronted with charges signed by bank officials and those whose names he had forged. The amount of his stealings will, it is said, total sixteen thousand dollars.

Ayers, Capt. Otis, Big Rapid, Mich. Salvationist. Assault; convicted.

This militant follower of the meek and lowly one was found guilty of criminal assault on an eighteen-year-old girl.

Baldwin, Wm. J., Chicago, Ill. Evangelist. Charged with non-support by his wife. This preacher's wife testified in the domestic relations court that her husband had locked her out of the house. She further testified that he talked much of harmony in the home and of a man's duty to his wife and family.

Baldwin, Rev. James H., St. Louis, Mo. Church of Christ. Desertion of wife and nine children.

"The most lovable man she ever knew," is the way in which Mrs. Allie Leona Erb, aged twenty-two, describes the holy man who figures as her partner in a sensational elopement.

Baylis, Rev. Dr. Charles T., New York City, N. Y. Larceny.

He raised $7,300 for the Allies' Hospital Relief Commission, and is said not to have turned it over. Dismissed as Director General of the Commission. Arrested on three indictments for grand larceny. Released on $2,500 bail. Denies charges.

Beard, Rev. E. M., Womble, Ark. Attempted assault on sister-in-law; she shot and killed him.

A coroner's jury found that Miss Billingsly was justified in ridding the community of this strong arm of the Lord. It was testified to before the jury that on two previous occasions the Rev. Beard had beaten the girl, and the morning of the tragedy told his wife he intended to kill the girl and then kill himself. The motive for his actions does not show, and the meagre press reports leave quite a bit to the individual imagination.

Beck, Rev. Elvin E., Lebanon, Pa. Jailed on serious charge preferred by young girl.

Beckwith, Rev. Milton, South Auburn, Me. Methodist. Bastardy.

Mrs. Marie Goding says he is the father of her child. The court ordered a verdict of guilty against him and that he pay the complainant $140.75 and $50 costs with $2 weekly until the child is sixteen years old.

"Starting a home for children" was this man's graft.

Beuscher, Rev. Frank, Brooklyn, N. Y. German Evangelical. Misconduct with a servant and with a deaconess.

Brooks, Rev. C. L., Muskogee, Okla. Methodist. Perjury.

The case grows out of charges involving a woman member of his church at Stigler, Okla.

Brown, Rev. C. S. L., Kansas City, Mo. Christian. Murder; suicide.

"Ends bad career" is the press caption that records the passing of the Rev. Brown. In a jealous quarrel he shot and killed Miss Edith Ward and seriously wounded Mrs. Lanybere. The tragedy occurred in a rooming house. He had served a term in jail for gambling away church funds intrusted to his care.

Brown, Rev. Geo., Chicago, Ill. Murder.

Brown, who is a blacksmith preacher, killed William McLain for an exhibition of irreverence at a prayer meeting.

Browne, Rev. R. A. M., San Francisco, Cal. Presbyterian. Adultery.

"We find that Mrs. Maude Hendricks committed suicide in a fit of despondency following her desertion by R. A. M. Browne, who lived with her adulterously, and we hereby charge Browne with adultery." The foregoing was the finding of the coroner's jury sitting on the case of Mrs. Maude Hendricks, suicide. The Rev. Browne, who won her affection and for whom she deserted her husband, later deserted her when exposure was imminent.

Bryant, Rev. W. F., Chattanooga, Tenn. Holy Roller. Using the mails to defraud.

Buzzard, Rev. Jacob D., Pittsburgh, Pa. Spiritualistic. Fortune telling and improper use of the mails.

He was charged with dispensing medical advice and advance information on tomorrow through the mails. Fees charged ran from 25 cents to all the traffic would bear. He attributes his downfall to envious M. Ds., but we strongly suspect the D. Ds.

Campbell, Rev. W. J., Nescopeck, Pa. Christian. Slander. Sued by a woman evangelist for $10,000.

"Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb?
And shall I fear to steal a horse,
Or blush to ride the same?"

Campbell, Rev. Jas. I., Hackensack, N. J. Methodist. Wife beating.

In jail the clergyman said that his arrest was a frame-up of the first order. His wife said his cruelty was unbearable.

Carroll, Rev., Helena, Mont. Roman Catholic. Contempt; jailed and fined one hundred dollars.

Relying on the favor generally shown to priests of the "sacred cow," Priest Carroll coolly ignored a summons calling for his appearance in a civil suit being tried in the district court. Arraigned before Judge Clements and asked why he didn't appear, the priest answered that he didn't have to obey a summons of that kind; the judge promptly fined him one hundred dollars. The Rev. Carroll's lawyer began to protest. The court ordered him to sit down; he persisted, and was fined $300. Priest and lawyer were then placed in the "cooler."

Carroll, Rev. Harry M., Chicago, Ill. Methodist. Drug law violation.

He was arrested in a North Clark street saloon, charged with peddling prescriptions to drug fiends. On his person the officers found a Bible and a bottle of whisky.

Clark, Rev. J. E., Oakdale, Cal. Accused of being responsible for death of Mrs. Stage.

He forced his unwelcome attentions on Mrs. Stage's daughter-in-law, Mrs. Ford, to such an extent that guards were employed to protect the Stage home where Mrs. Ford lived. He also penned threatening notes that read like the villain's lines in a cheap melodrama. Mrs. Stage was found dead in her home under suspicious circumstances.

Clark, Rev. Theodore F., Brooklyn, N. Y. Methodist.

An effort was made after his death to set aside his will on the ground that he was insane. It was alleged that he had called his congregation "a lot of knock-kneed, hollow-chested idiots," and had a mania for picking strawberries in his bare feet, as well as doing other ridiculous things.

Clark, Rev. W. D. Hastings. Forgery and wife desertion; convicted and sentenced to five years in reformatory.

Clarke, Rev. John C., Berkeley, Cal. Church of the Living God.

Warrant was issued for his arrest for an alleged statutory offense against Louise E. Dean, 14 years old, daughter of another preacher of the sect. A fugitive from justice.

Clarkson, Rev. N. N., Chicago, Ill. Mission Assn. Defendant in divorce suit.

In a case that reeks with "spiritual affinities," romances with "red light" missionaries, and hints of "acts too scandalous in character to be recited," the Rev. Clarkson plays the lead. Mrs. Clarkson objected to the "spiritually minded maidens" seeking "sanctification" under his guidance.

Clifton, Rev. B. F., Crawfordsville, Ind. Methodist. Grand larceny; convicted.

This trial and conviction was apparently the sensation of the year in Crawfordsville; the minister appears to have been willing to "lift" anything that was movable, and when conditions were favorable, autos were his fancy. In summing up, the attorney for defense advanced as a reason why he should be freed that his conviction would be a terrible blow to the church. He was given an indeterminate sentence of from one to fourteen years.

Cole, Rev. J. L., Elmira, N. Y. Cruelty to animals.

He allowed a horse owned by him to starve to death. The press reports say that it is "the worst case ever brought to the attention of the Humane Society."

His friends raised the money to repay the loan and prosecution was dropped.

The Rev. Cooper was formerly one of the best known pastors in New England, and made a record for work done in behalf of the Epworth League.

Corbin, Rev. O. L., Alturas, Cal. Congregational. Perjury.

Having figured as correspondent in a divorce case, he was later indicted for making a false oath.

Costello, Rev. Wm. J., Brooklyn, N. Y. Roman Catholic.

Mentioned as one of the "reasons why" in a recent separation suit, it developed that this representative of the "true faith" was much given to joy riding with a certain young lady, while her brother-in-law paid the gasoline bills. Brother-in-law objected, and thus another holy man is subjected to the cruel suspicions of the "crass materialists."

Cox, Rev. J. B., Jonesboro, Ky. Baptist. Chicken thief; convicted and given thirty days in jail.

Cox, Rev. J. Paris, Laporte, Ind. Methodist. Forgery.

Crisswell, Rev. Geo. M., Pittsburg, Pa. Evangelist. Wife desertion.

Cross, Rev. Price E., Evansville, Ind. Christian. Improper advances toward female members of his congregation. "Go and sin no more" was the parting injunction of his church board to the Rev. Cross as he was leaving Evansville, following the charges made against him by women of his congregation. He left in full knowledge that the way of the transgressor is hard, as a brother-in-law of the complaining witnesses had put the parson's eyes in mourning.

Csmiada, Rev. Paul, Metuchen, N. J. Roman Catholic. Drunk and disorderly.

The conduct of the good father at a pig roast held in this vicinity recently was such as to cause many members of his congregation to sign a petition and forward it to Bishop McFaul. It is possible that what his congregation took to be drunk and disorderly conduct was merely religious enthusiasm. Who are they anyway to censor the actions of this man filled with the spirit (or spirits)?

Dalton, Rev. John J., Tahlequah, Okla. Presbyterian. Degenerate.

Arrested as a result of his conduct with a young boy, this preacher was sentenced to the State Hospital for the Insane.

Darling, Rev. J. D., Columbus, O. Methodist.

Superintendent of the Ohio Sunday School Association. Accused and must face trial for conduct unbecoming a minister, consisting of writing love letters to young ladies. Pleads innocence, but resigns as superintendent.

Darnell, Rev. Jas. M., Chicago, Ill. Unitarian. Bigamy and white slavery; sentenced to three years in Leavenworth prison.

Known as the marrying parson, the Rev. Darnell's case attracted national attention. He seemed to marry "regardless," as Bret Harte would say. Three women in different parts of the country called him husband, and one of them carried a five months' old baby in her arms at the time of his conviction. For some time he denied being the father of this child, but finally admitted that he was. The district attorney who conducted the case against him gave him a sensational exhortation.

Davis, Rev. Howard, Montgomery, Mo. Methodist. Improper use of U. S. mails; sentenced to three years in Federal penitentiary.

He was a married man and of considerable prominence in church circles when he became infatuated with a woman in Mexico, Mo.

The Rev. Davis, who was a quack in addition to being a gospel spieler, is accused of assaulting his ten-year-old adopted daughter.

De Hart, Rev. S., Philadelphia, Pa. Sued for divorce on grounds of cruel and improper conduct.

The minister's lawyer created a stir in the court room by declaring that a "man has a right to knock a woman down and put his foot on her chest, as the governing head of the household," all in the sweet name of Christianity that has done so much for woman.

Delk, Rev. J. A., Ft. Wayne, Ind. Christian. Forgery; convicted and given a five year sentence.

Denes, Rev. F. C., Belt, Mont. Roman Catholic. Rape; convicted and sentenced to twenty year prison term.

The Rev. Hans Schmidt gave us the most revolting crime of the decade, and now another Catholic priest gives us the crime of the year. There is something peculiarly abhorrent about this story of the Rev. Denes' attack on the hunchback girl, Susan Bachan. He hired her to keep his rooms in order and in return was to instruct her in music and pay her six dollars monthly additional. The girl testified that after he had attacked her several times she grew so afraid of him that she would not go to his rooms unless accompanied by girl friends. A child was born to her and was produced in evidence at the trial.

Devona, Rev. F. S., St. Clair, Mich. Episcopal. Poison pen writer; conduct unbecoming a minister.

This was a lovely ecclesiastical scrimmage; cries of "you're another" filled the air. The Rev. Devona was named as the author of notes reflecting on his fellows of the cloth. He answered by charging that he had been slandered. A letter of comfort came to Rev. Devona from the Rev. John E. Meally telling him to "read again the thirty-seventh Psalm and rest in Jehovah." If Devona's accusers have their way he will probably rest in jail.

Dickens, Rev. J. W., Memphis, Tenn. Baptist. Suicide.

His salary not being large enough to support a wife and four children, he put a bullet through his brain and left them without any support at all.

Dinger, Rev. Jesse Eugene, Hartville, Ohio. Evangelist. Adultery.

His wife, suing for divorce, had him arrested as he stepped on the lecture platform, charging that he had been unlawfully cohabiting with a woman in Cleveland. In his youth Dinger was known as the Boy Orator.

Donaldson, Rev. George, Kalamazoo, Mich. Methodist. Assault and battery; jailed.

His wife caused his arrest after he had beaten their twenty-five-year-old daughter so brutally that she had to have medical attention.

Dubbel, Rev. F. J., Anaheim, Cal. Reckless driving while under the influence of liquor; five hundred dollars awarded to man injured by joy riding pastor's auto.

The reverend gentleman is what is known in the vernacular as "some speed merchant," forty miles an hour, and the wrong side of the road, so the witnesses testified.

Dunn, Rev. Gustavus A., Muskogee, Okla. Christian. Kidnapping.

Breaking down the door of his wife's home, the Rev. Dunn entered and seizing their six-year-old child made good his escape by automobile. His wife, from whom he had been separated for the last four years, was absent from home at the time. According to late news he was under arrest and the child in the custody of the state.

Earl, Rev. Robert, Schuyler Falls, N. Y. Falsehood; expelled.

Ebersole, Rev. Silas N., South Bend, Ind. Dunkard. Accused of murder; commits suicide in jail.

He was accused of having murdered fifteen-year-old Hazel Macklin. The evidence against him, although circumstantial, was convincing.

Edwards, Rev. Grant, St. Louis, Mo. Baptist. Assault and battery; sentenced to six months in jail and fined $100 and costs.

The Rev. Edwards conducted a hair-dressing parlor as a sideline to his soul-saving profession. A Miss Genevieve Boyce was one of those who went to him for hair treatment; she testified that on one occasion he kissed her; not being in a receptive mood she caused his arrest.

Elliott, Rev. Robert J., Revere, Mass. Congregationalist. Adultery.

Mrs. Elliott, in a suit for divorce, charges cruel treatment and the statutory offense.

Evans, Rev. E. T., Port Huron, Mich. Episcopal. Bigamy and swindling.

This preacher is wanted by the police of Great Britain and America following his elopement with and marriage to Miss Davis, his choir singer. He has a wife and two children now residing in England.

Evans, Rev. J. Lewis, Cedar Grove, N. J. Congregational. Kissing bug; resigns following charges.

"A mere boyish prank" is the way the Rev. Evans, a stripling of fifty-five, explains his osculatory attentions to Miss Maud Jacobus, one of his parishioners and the complaining witness. The church committee allowed him to resign. The church is now looking for a kiss-proof pastor.

Farr, Rev. James M., Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Presbyterian. Fraud.

One of the names mentioned in a jury payroll scandal is that of Rev. Jas. M. Farr. The pay of the parson was padded, according to the detectives who investigated.

Fisher, Rev. E. P., Murphysboro, Ill. Presbyterian.

Forced to resign the pastorate of the First Presbyterian church when confronted by Fanny Young, who said she was tricked into a marriage by him seven years before in Chicago. She also said he was obliged to leave Ellensdale, N. D., under charges. Fisher afterwards made a public apology in which it is alleged that he admitted having lived with the woman in Chicago.

Fisher, Rev. Richard, Dallas, Tex. Murderous assault.

Fitzpatrick, Rev. James B., Portland, Ore. Roman Catholic. Forgery.

Charged with forging a note for $6,000, this priest was released on bail. Then he left Portland and was arrested in Los Angeles at the request of the Portland authorities. As usual he was referred to in the press reports as "former priest."

Fleming, Rev. Wesley, Wheeling, W. Va. Evangelist. White slavery; adultery. When arrested he said: "The Lord will take care of me."

Flood, Rev. James F., Chicago, Ill. Roman Catholic. Defendant in suit for damages.

He is alleged to have entered the rooms where Mrs. Gage was lying sick in bed, without knocking, and ordered her out. This was less than a month after they had rented the flat. The priest, who owned the property, later made false statements as to the Gages being in arrears on rent.

Foard, Rev. F. C. V., San Antonio, Texas. Holy Roller. Disturbance of the peace.

The services conducted by the Rev. Foard resembled, so it is said, the Holy Roller ritual, and were in consequence of great annoyance to those unfortunate enough to be in the neighborhood.

Folsom, Rev. Harold M., Portsmouth, N. H. Adultery; defendant in divorce action; pleads guilty.

Owing to the social prominence of the preacher, this case was widely commented on. In a letter to Judge Dike he admitted his immoral conduct with the eighteen-year-old girl named in his wife's complaint. Last accounts have him renouncing the Episcopal faith and evangelizing in Canada.

Forman, Rev. G. W., Cal. Sentenced to thirteen months in San Quentin prison for forgery. At the time was under parole for a former offense in Washington.

Said he committed the crime in order to obtain money to attend the Los Angeles Bible Institute.

Foster, Rev. S., Little Rock, Ark. Shop lifting.

The business card of this pastor set forth that he neither drank, smoked nor chewed hay. This did not prevent him, however, from attaching himself to sundry articles that he hadn't bothered to pay for. When searched, a pint of "tanglefoot" was found upon him.

Frost, Rev. W. Jerome, Davie, Fla. Presbyterian. Attempted rape on a colored woman.

Was tipped off and left town before a warrant could be issued. Has been identified as the "W. J. Frost" who in a former edition of the "Crimes of Preachers" was ousted from a Congregational church at Harvey, Ill., in 1900, for intimacy with his servant girl.

Garland, Rev. John S., Georgetown, Conn. Congregational. Misuse of funds.

This reverend gentleman is described by his father-in-law as the "slickest thing that ever was." Not to pay was a matter of principle with him, and when he hurriedly left town, on a farewell "touch" of twenty dollars, the townsfolk were relieved of a great strain on the pocketbook.

Garrett, Rev. A. P., Cairo, Ill. Baptist. Suicide.

Gerry, Rev. Wm., Huntington, W. Va. Christian. Found guilty of manslaughter; five-year sentence.

Gerrin, Rev. M. R., Caney, Kan. Roman Catholic.

After two days' trial was sentenced to six months in the county jail and to pay a fine of $500 for improper relations with a young woman. His own parishioners instigated the prosecution.

Gerritt, Rev. Howard, Big Rapids, Mich. Methodist. Wanted on statutory charge preferred by girl.

Gilbert, Rev. Henry Stewart, Rio Grande, N. J. Baptist.

In 1898 he enlisted for the Spanish War, and though heard from since, has never returned. His wife now asks a divorce on ground of desertion.

Gillan, Rev., Minneapolis, Minn. Catholic. Disorderly.

Arrested on the complaint of young woman who says the Holy Dad accosted her and made improper advances. When arrested a bottle of booze partly gone was found on Gillan's person. The press and police have shown due respect for the cloth in their handling of the case; not a whisper of the scandal has appeared in any of the daily papers, with the exception of the Twin City Reporter. At most it was an innocent diversion.

Goodson, Rev. C. Polk, Lima, Ohio. Presbyterian. Immoral conduct with women of his congregation; resigned.

Gordon, Rev. Wm. E., Cadillac, Mich. Methodist. Jumped board bill; convicted and sentenced to jail.

He now threatens to convert the convicts in jail.

The charges were made by Miss Elizabeth Gleason prior to her death, which occurred two years ago, as the result of an operation, presumably an illegal one.

Graham, Rev. Jos. S., Albany, N. Y. Roman Catholic. Suicide.

Gray, Rev. Wm. A., Redding, Cal. Holiness. Felony.

Placed under arrest charged with fraud in obtaining shares from bank and not acknowledging receipt of same.

Gresham, Rev. J. S., Dalton, Ga. Charged with murder.

An ebony-hued affinity is said to have been the cause of his murder of Norris Galloway, a negro brick mason of this place.

Griffiths, Rev. Geo. M., Akron, O. Congregational. Conduct unbecoming a minister.

As a minister he was a most successful lover. Engaged to three girls at the one time, he elopes with one of them, leaving the other two disconsolate. The State Conference suspended him.

Grimes, Rev. Milton, Columbus, Ind. Violation of Game law; convicted; sentenced to jail.

Grocata, Rev. Francis, Rutland, Vt. Roman Catholic. Found guilty of being party to a murder.

The Rev. Grocata is a product of Sicily, a land where filth walks hand-in-hand with faith, where bandits flourish and crimes of passion are, one might say, of hourly occurrence. This priest was a fitting representative of his malignant land and faith—Catholicism. He was party to the murder of a fellow countryman, Accorta Santa. A woman was the reason.

Grunewald, Rev. Chas., S. Sp., Detroit, Mich. Roman Catholic. Misuse of funds.

This is a moving tale of one who, putting aside the contemplative life, ventured into the realms of high finance, equipped with the cash and confidence of his flock. He is said to have fallen a victim to scheming promoters, and deserves as little sympathy as those who listen to the wire-tappers. It is simply a case of the would-be trimmer being trimmed.

Gucwa, Rev. Edward, Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Roman Catholic. Contempt of court; sentenced to three months in jail.

He was held to be responsible for church riots, and had been deposed.

Hall, Rev. Finley M., Kansas City, Mo. Deserted his wife and three children, saying that "the Lord comes first."

Made crazy by the Billy Sunday meetings in Kansas City, he read the Bible continually, and told his wife that the ravens would feed her and the children as they did Elijah in the wilderness. The ravens, however, were on a strike and she had to appeal to the city authorities for assistance.

Hamilton, Rev. S. A. D., Albany, Or. Street evangelist.

He attempted to assault an eight-year-old girl, and on advice of physicians was committed to the asylum.

Hamlin, Rev. F. C., Chicago, Ill. Baptist. Borrowed $23 from a lady friend and disappeared, leaving a young wife.

Handicott, Capt., Brooklyn, N. Y. Salvationist. Degenerate practices.

The Salvation quarters at 1828 Fulton street are alleged to have been the rendezvous of a band of degenerates. The charges against Handicott are serious enough to send him to prison for the rest of his life.

Harvey, Rev. Edwin L., Chicago, Ill. Evangelist. Stealing.

He withheld from the widow, it is alleged, a large sum of money belonging to a man who died in his mission.

Harvey, Rev. George H., Chicago, Ill. Congregational. Performed marriage ceremonies without authority.

Some persons whom the "Rev." Harvey was supposed to have united in marriage discover that he is unordained, and that they have unconsciously been living in sin.

Hawkins, Rev. J. H., Cincinnati, Ohio. Passing worthless checks.

Hawkins, Rev. Otis, Dallas, Texas. Campbellite. Committed suicide.

Heitler, Rev. James A., Lititz, Pa. Denomination not given.

He pleaded guilty to the charge of pension frauds in U. S. District Court and was fined $500.

Hess, Rev. Edward, North Winnipeg, Canada. Roman Catholic. Arrested charged with grave offense against a young girl.

The Rev. Hess was arrested as he left a church at this place. His arrest was ordered by the Royal Mounted Police of Regina, the place of residence of the injured girl. The power of the "Sacred Cow" is again shown in the guarded, almost apologetic manner of the brief press reports.

Hill, Rev. J. T., Los Angeles, Cal. Baptist. Sued for breach of promise.

The trial of this suit promises to embarrass the pastor considerably, for, subsequently to his alleged promise to marry Miss Young, he wooed, won and wedded Mrs. Gertrude Blackwell of Chicago, who had a fortune of $50,000 in her own name. The jilted girl asks for $10,000 heart balm.

Hill, Rev. John Wesley, New York City. Methodist. Sued for breach of promise.

The weeping wooer might fittingly describe Dr. Hill, according to interviews given by Miss Lucille Covington, who makes him defendant in a breach of promise suit for $100,000. Miss Covington says the doctor wept as he wooed her, the while he posed as a single man. The Rev. Hill has attained some notoriety as a Socialist killer and as a defendant of the home. In an interview granted to the newspaper men, the good doctor grew facetious and remarked that this (the breach of promise suit) had never happened to him before.

Hillis, Rev. Newell Dwight, Brooklyn, N. Y. Congregationalist. Libel.

This suit was the aftermath of the financial scandal that stirred up such a fuss in Henry Ward Beecher's old church, Plymouth, of which the Rev. Hillis is now pastor. It is alleged by the complainant, the Rev. Hillis' nephew, that his uncle made false statements about him in an effort to make the nephew the scapegoat for the Rev. Hillis' financial blunders, which had cost his congregation dearly.

Hoffstead, Rev. Harvey O., Paris, Tenn. Methodist. Found guilty of drunkenness, profanity and a domestic offense and suspended from conference for twelve months.

Holden, Rev. Albert, Toledo, O. Evangelist. Bigamy; confessed, and was sentenced to six years in penitentiary.

The Rev. Holden told the court that sentenced him that his prayers and struggles against the sin of bigamy had availed him naught. Thirteen times had he taken unto himself a fresh wife. "The world, the flesh and the devil" had won a signal victory over this weak vessel of the Lord. He is reported to have two sons, also under indictment for bigamy.

Holgreve, Rev. John J., New Orleans, La. Roman Catholic. Libel and other grave charges.

The press report is brief to the point of obscurity in reporting the indictment of this priest. Thirty-one bills were returned against him, twenty-eight charge grave crimes, and the other three allege libel.

Holley, Rev. Jasper Elza, Hiawatha, Kan. Nonsupport of wife and child.

The Rev. Holley's wife charges further that he treated her cruelly and that he was flirtatious.

Holliman, Rev. Charles V., Social Hill, Ark. Methodist. Jailed in Pulaski county, Ark.; accused of violating the Mann Act.

He eloped with a Miss Ruby Ray, whom he promised to marry as soon as he could get a divorce from his wife.

Holmes, Rev. A. A., Modesto, Cal. Baptist.

Accused of misconduct with an orphan girl 17 years old. Denied the charge and attributed it to the Catholic church and the liquor interests. The charge was pushed, however, by one other minister, a minister's wife, a probation officer, a physician, an assemblyman, three ladies and another prominent citizen, who had no connections either with the liquor interests or the Catholic church.

Holmgren, Rev. Hugo, New York. Episcopal. Murderous assault.

Some boys were playing in front of his house when he raised a window and fired on them, wounding a ten-year-old.

Horton, Rev. John, Chicago, Ill. Salvation Army. Bigamy.

He confessed his guilt, and was then surrendered to the authorities by his bondsman, who feared the parson might vamose.

Houston, Rev. John S., Hazlehurst, Ga. Baptist. Bigamy.

He is said to have wedded three young women, whom he later deserted.

Howard, Rev. John, New York City, N. Y. Evangelist humbug.

While preaching on the street he declared that, like Jesus, he could walk on water. He tried the feat on the North river, was pulled out, arrested and placed in Bellevue.

Howard, Rev. Samuel, Hammond, Ind. Robbery and assault; deposed.

Hoyt, Rev. Osman P., Beacon, N. Y. Methodist. Libel.

He has been sued by the mayor of Beacon, James A. Frost. The Rev. Hoyt accused the mayor of countenancing the Sunday saloons, also of patronizing them. The mayor's answer was the $10,000 libel suit and a statement in which he said the parson was attempting to imitate Billy Sunday.

Hull, Rev. A. A., Anderson, Cal. Baptist. Fraud.

Charged with dishonesty in connection with securing deed to a church parsonage.

Jackson, Rev. John M., Oakland, Cal. Methodist. Breach of trust.

Mrs. Esther Kneib says that the parson and a trustee sold property of hers that they had induced her to transfer to them to be held in trust, and did not get more than half what it was worth at that.

Jajeski, Rev. Henry, St. Paul, Minn. Polish Catholic. Rape.

Shot and killed by woman he is alleged to have violated. Mrs. Dudek, the woman in the case, sued the priest in 1913 for damages to the amount of $15,000, claiming that the Rev. Jajeski had raped her. Two juries disagreed and a third released the defendant. He was transferred to St. Paul; Mrs. Dudek followed and he turned her away. She then killed him. She names the priest as the father of her baby. There are said to be many sacerdotal sports of like calibre in the vicinity of St. Paul.

Jessup, Rev. Albert, Keokuk, Iowa. Baptist. Suicide.

Johns, Rev. Geo. B., Flint, Mich. Evangelist. Grand larceny.

Johnson, Rev. Albert, Detroit, Mich. Assault and battery; sentenced to ninety days in jail.

While the church organist played "Nearer My God to Thee," the Rev. Johnson gave vent to his sadistic impulses by plying a bull whip on the back and shoulders of a woman member of his congregation. Her screams attracted the police, who were compelled to draw their revolvers before they could make the arrest. Investigation disclosed the fact that Johnson has been an associate of two desperadoes now serving two and a half years apiece in state prison.

Johnson, Rev. Frank P., New Orleans, La. Episcopal. Drunk and disorderly.

The person was booked at the police station as a D. D. following a wild night in the "Tango and Cabaret Belt" of New Orleans, where he earned the reputation (among the girls) of being "some tango stepper." When the police took him in charge, he was doing a clog dance on a table in one of the notorious tenderloin resorts, and distributing largesse to all and sundry in the form of one dollar bills.

Johnson, Rev. P. Horwood, Clarence, Mo. Methodist. Conduct unbecoming a minister.

A letter written by the parson to a young woman of his congregation is believed to have been the reason for his sudden withdrawal from the ministry and his departure from Clarence. "God knows my sin" is Johnson's explanation, and then he adds, "I have not been guilty of immorality, but of injudicious conduct through correspondence."

Johnson, Rev. John T., Los Angeles, Cal. Mormon. Disorderly conduct; sentenced to ninety days in jail.

This Latter Day Saint was arrested at one of the beach resorts of Los Angeles for improper conduct and profanity.

Johnson, Rev. Walter D. F., Brooklyn, N. Y. Exceeding the speed limit in his automobile; fined $25.

Jones, Rev. Hugh, Cincinnati, Ohio. Obtaining money under false pretenses; jailed.

He canvassed Cincinnati with another clerical beat, pretending that he was collecting funds for a children's home.

Jones, Rev. W. M., Mineral Springs, Ark. Methodist. Forgery.

Held by grand jury and remanded to jail.

Jones, Rev. Walter G., Jersey City, N. J. Baptist. Rape.

He is accused of having attacked Miss Laura Thrope, employed as a maid in his home. At the time of the assault the girl was under the age of consent.

Joslin, Rev. Lewis H., Monroeville, N. J. Methodist.

His wife swore out a warrant for him, charging that he eloped in an automobile with Miss Nettie Lafferty, an attractive young member of his congregation.

Juergens, Rev. Wm., St. Louis, Mo. Lutheran. Grand larceny; confessed his guilt.

Karappiris, Rev. Saphronis, Rock Island, Ill. Greek Orthodox. Held on charge of grand larceny.

Kassar, Rev. Paul, Summit, N. J. Catholic. Placed under $1,000 bail for interfering with police officer.

Keep, Rev. Richard H., Brooklyn, N. Y. Swedenborgian Moravian. Immoral conduct; confessed his guilt and sentence was deferred.

One newspaper account of the parson's lapse says he put his arm around the waist of a fifteen-year-old girl while riding on a street car; another says he slapped her on the thigh, while still another reports him as having—but why continue? The girl had him arrested.

Kelly, Rev. Lynn George J., Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Evangelist. Arrested for trying to induce young women to pose for him in the "altogether."

This pious youth was writing a work called "The Temptress." He desired to illustrate it with etchings from the nude, but the models he sought refused to hearken to his plea of art for Christ's sake, and called the police.

Kelly, Rev. Paul, San Jose, Cal. Baptist. Improper conduct toward a young woman.

This was the second recorded fall from grace of this parson; two years ago he was accused of having an illicit love affair with a 19-year-old girl. San Jose knows him no more.

Kimmons, Rev. J. A., Eljay, Ga. Baptist. Manslaughter; convicted and given eight-year sentence.

Here is a parson who antedated by some months the latter day preaching of "Fear God and take your own part." Battling at Armageddon, how he would have paralyzed the molluscoids. Strong voiced, strong armed, a Bible in one hand, a "forty-four" in the other, chanting "Onward, Christian Soldiers," the picture leaves nothing to be desired by the followers of the Prince of Peace.

King, Rev. Thomas, Madera, Cal. Roman Catholic. Rape.

Arrested on charge of assaulting Margaret Haley, 15 years old, the girl recently becoming a mother. She refused to speak the name of her assailant, but according to the statement of the district attorney she wrote Father King's name on a sheet of paper. King was released on $3,000 bail.

Kirbye, Rev. J. E., Des Moines, Iowa. Plymouth. Sued for slander.

Klass, Barnet, New York. Evangelist. Setting a fire and collecting insurance. This man, who is a converted Jew, mingled arson with Christian evangelism, and his arrest showed that he was an old offender.

Kline, Rev. Philip J., Henrietta, Tex. Catholic. Arson; convicted and given five years in prison.

The priest was found guilty of having burned a building which he owned, in order to obtain the insurance.

Kirby, Rev. Robert, Cincinnati, Ohio. Baptist. Sued for nonsupport of wife and child.

Klos, Rev. Frank, South Bend, Ind. Polish Catholic. Made defendant in breach of promise suit.

Kraft, Rev. S. B., Canton, O. Ordered by court to return money he obtained from a widow by selling her worthless stock.

Kramer, Rev. Carl, St. Louis, Mo. German Evangelical. Sued for divorce; wife charged cruel treatment.

Kraska, Rev. Valery, Posen, Germany. Roman Catholic. Adultery.

Named as correspondent in divorce suit filed in Portland, Ore., by Wawrzyniec Chybki against his wife, Pelagia Chybki. Her intimate relations with the priest caused the separation of husband and wife in Germany, where she still resides. She admits everything.

Kreger, Rev. S. S., Greenville, Tenn. Methodist. Improper relations; imprisonment from ten to fifteen years.

The Rev. Kreger was the most popular member of the conference, but as superintendent of the Methodist orphanage at Greenville he deflowered a 17-year-old girl. He is fifteen years in the ministry and married.

Kurland, Rabbi Lazar, New York, N. Y. Desertion.

Arrested charged with having deserted his wife and seven children, Rabbi Kurland was held in $480 bond and ordered to pay his wife $8 weekly. Kurland appeared in court in an expensive fur coat and silk hat, and had in his possession more than $100.

La Fontaine, Rev. Chas. V., Spokane, Wash. Nazarene. Unministerial conduct.

Called to the bedside of a member of his congregation to pray for her recovery, the weakness that had cost him pastorates in Chicago and Los Angeles again returned and he kissed her. He admitted his guilt and was suspended by his conference.

Lake, Rev. Edward W., New York. Presbyterian. Sexual fraud.

The wife of the Rev. Lake is suing for a separation and alimony because there are no children in the family and it is the fault of her husband's practices.

Lapp, Rev. Daniel G., Hastings, Neb. Mennonite. Made defendant in $25,000 damage suit.

He is alleged to have caused a Mrs. Lapp to desert her husband and ten children and elope with him.

Lee, Rev., Rocky Mount, N. C. Baptist. Embezzlement; convicted.

Lee, Rev. J. Beveridge, Philadelphia, Pa. Presbyterian. Malicious slander.

Leighton, Rev. W. A., Chicago, Ill. Congregational. Deceiving a woman and taking to drink.

He had a church in Edgerton, and although married became engaged to a local young lady. In Chicago he belonged to the Moody Institute, but when his sin found him out he began drinking heavily and landed in the Bridewell.

Lesches, Rev. L. M., Winona, Minn. Catholic. Murderous assault.

He shot Bishop Heffron as a result of brooding over the bishop's refusal to assign him to regular work. The church authorities say they had long known Priest Lesches was deranged, but thought him harmless. That the Catholic church should allow a man they knew to be unbalanced, to perform his priestly functions offers a startling commentary upon affairs Catholic.

Leut, Rev. T. H., Wichita, Kan. Sued for divorce.

Le Vine, Capt. David, Oshkosh, Wis. Salvation Army. Arrested charged with bigamy.

Like his namesake, that "sweet singer" of long ago, he was a devil among the girls.

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

John Eleazer Remsburg, Jan. 7, 1848.

The subject of this week's biography has unquestionably delivered more Freethought lectures than any other man living or dead. He has given the people some of their most valuable works of reference, and next to Ingersoll is beyond a doubt the most popular writer on Freethought subjects. Mr. Remsburg was born near Fremont, Ohio, January 7, 1848, his father being of German and his mother of English descent. Financial reverses and the blindness of his father prevented him from obtaining an education outside of the public schools and one term at a New York state academy. But he was ever a student, and a student is bound to obtain an education regardless of difficulties. When sixteen years of age he enlisted in the Union Army, and is said to have been the youngest man who carried a musket during the civil war. He served in Washington during the year 1864 and was in the battle of Ft. Stevens. General Early, the well-known Confederate commander, attempted a raid upon Washington and young Remsburg was with the army that repulsed him. The following winter he did police duty in Nashville, Tenn., that entire state then being under military rule. When the war ended he was in the pioneer corps, from which he received an honorable discharge and a special certificate of thanks from Abraham Lincoln. At the close of the war he engaged in school teaching; in 1868 removed to Atchison Co., Kansas, where he has since resided and where, in 1872, he was elected County Superintendent of Public Instruction, a position he held four years.

In his youth Mr. Remsburg, like most persons who have never investigated the subject of religion was nominally a believer. He had never seen a Freethought book, but accident brought him into contact with Paine's "Age of Reason," which he read. Since then he has been a radical Freethinker. In 1880 he entered the lecture field, and in fourteen years had spoken in and over six hundred localities, a record not approached by any other man, having traveled to reach these appointments over a hundred and fifty thousand miles.

Among the many works by Mr. Remsburg have been: "Life of Thomas Paine." Except Dr. Moncure D. Conway, no writer has done so much to defend and redeem the reputation of that great man. As this is written, a new book by Mr. Remsburg on Paine is on the press. Others of his works are: "The Bible," "The Christ," "Six Historic Americans," where he gives practically all the evidence touching upon the religious opinions of Abraham Lincoln; "The Image Breaker," "False Claims" and the "Fathers of Our Republic." His lectures have been translated into German, Swedish, Norwegian, some Asiatic languages and have had a large circulation in India.

As an orator Mr. Remsburg is forceful, but always calm and collected, never becoming excited or losing his temper. He has held many debates with ministers, one being with Prof. D. R. Dungan, acknowledged by all to have been one of the ablest defenders of Christianity in the west. Only recently he and his good wife celebrated the forty-fifth anniversary of their marriage. They have five sons and one daughter living and one son dead. At present Mr. and Mrs. Remsburg reside in Potter, Kansas, where he edits a weekly paper, and where both are respected alike by their Christian as well as their infidel neighbors. He was elected president of the American Secular Union at its last Congress.

Cheering Some One On.

Don't you mind about the triumphs,
Don't you worry about fame;
Don't you grieve about succeeding,
Let the future guard your name.
All the best in life's the simplest,
Love will last when wealth is gone;
Just be glad that you are living,
And keep cheering some one on.

Let your neighbors have the blossoms,
Let your comrades wear the crown;
Never mind the little setbacks
Nor the blows that knock you down.
You'll be there when they're forgotten,
You'll be glad with youth and dawn,
If you just forget your troubles
And keep cheering some one on.

There's a lot of sorrow round you,
Lots of lonesomeness and tears;
Lots of heartaches and of worry
Through the shadows of the years.
And the world needs more than triumphs;
More than all the swords we've drawn,
It is hungering for the follow
Who keeps cheering others on.

Let the wind around you whistle,
And the storms around you play;
You'll be here with brawn and gristle
When the conquerors decay.
You'll be here in memories sweetened
If the souls you've saved from pawn,
If you put aside the victories
And keep cheering some one on.

Bird Census of 1915.

A recently published bulletin of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, from the pen of the lamented Wells W. Cooke, presents the results of the second annual bird count in the United States, carried out in 1915. It is based on 315 reports, from every state in the Union except Utah and Nevada, and shows a gratifying agreement with the results obtained the previous year. "When an enumeration of birds was first suggested," says the author, "the project was the subject of much good-natured banter and some criticism from those who declared the scheme utterly visionary," but these animadversions were based upon misunderstanding of the methods to be employed and the objects in view. The average bird population of that part of the northeastern United States devoted to agriculture has been determined with sufficient accuracy to furnish data having various practical and scientific applications, and some useful general information has been obtained in reference to the rest of the country. The average in the northeastern states is about 800 pairs of birds to the square mile. It is not yet possible to estimate the population of each species, except for a few of the commonest and most widely distributed, such as the English sparrow and the robin, for which the reports are sufficiently numerous to permit an approximate estimate.

The most elaborate report received in 1915 was that of the campus of Cornell University. Its 256 acres were divided into six blocks, and the survey of each was made by a different person, the whole being in charge of Professor A. A. Allen, of the university. The densest bird population was found on a small private estate near Washington, D. C., with 135 pairs nesting on five acres, and the most varied bird population in the bird sanctuary and park known as Woollen's Garden, near Indianapolis, with 62 species on 44 acres.

Some Scientist!

The scientist had given a very scientific lecture, and at the end he said, beaming down on his audience condescendingly:

"Now, if there is any scientific question that any of my friends would like to ask, I beg them not to hesitate. I shall be only too happy to answer any inquiry in my power."

An old lady in spectacles that gave her a severe, stern look rose and said:

"Why do wet tea leaves kill cockroaches?"

The scientist did not know wet tea leaves did anything of the kind, much less the cause of the phenomenon; but, never at a loss, he replied:

"Because, madam, when a cockroach comes across a wet tea leaf, he says: 'Halloa, here's a blanket,' and wraps himself up in it, catches cold, and dies."—Tit-Bits.

Good Advertising.

"To illustrate the uses of advertisements," says a well known theatrical manager, "there is one experience I had of which I often think. I was driving when I came to a farm where there was a meadow to let. The owner of this farm would have made a good advertisement manager, for the big poster announcing that the meadow was to let was worded as follows: 'This field to let, seventeen acres, for grazing. Persons having old cattle or cattle with strong appetites had better be cautious in turning them out to graze here, as my grass is so rich that it would be liable to injure them for the first week or so.'"

Letters of Friends

FREE SPEECH FOR ALL.

From Chas. F. Randall, Oklahoma.
To the Editor of The Truth Seeker.

In the September 2 issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, among the "Letters from Friends" is an article of mine under the heading "Mental Freedom," in which occurs the following sentence.

"We frequently see an article marring the pages of Freethought journals advocating the idea of restricting the speech of Catholics and other religionists, when they urge of unions that the writers consider pernicious."

The editor, evidently, was doubtful of my ability to prove my assertion, for in a foot note he comes at me with the following rejoinder.

"A Freethinker who advocates restricting the speech of Catholics should be named and laboured with, and also the Freethought paper extending to him the hospitality of its columns. We are unacquainted with the 'intolerant' Freethinkers discovered by occasional correspondents."

I intended furnishing the required information immediately; but I often give my Freethought literature to those not in the habit of indulging in that kind of mental diet, and could not find readily what I wanted. Besides, I have been very busy and could not find time to conduct a very extensive search.

Moreover, I was confident that The Truth Seeker was one of the guilty journals, and one of its editors, one of the offending writers. Recently I came across the December 18, 1915, number, and found that my confidence in my recollection was fully justified.

On page 804, at the head of the first column, is the following by S. W. Washburn. But first, let me say that there is not a writer with whose work I am acquainted, that I admire more, or who, as a general thing, expresses my own opinion as fully and completely as Mr. Washburn. My article was written in no unfriendly spirit, nor because I have any prejudice in favor of Catholicism. If there is anything I hate with an unconquerable hatred it is every kind of religion; but most especially Romanism.

Mr. Washburn says: "Our country is allowing too much freedom in some directions; in allowing a priest of the Roman Catholic Church to do and say things in the name of religion which may lead to the corruption of human morals; is allowing our priests to condemn our schools, insult our school teachers and control, in too many instances, the action of our school-boards." Roman Catholics demand the liberty to kill liberty for others. It is time to call a halt to the "impudence of the Church."

I have italicized that part which is intolerant. Freethinkers are supposed to be advocates of freedom of speech, as well as thought. Freedom of action too, unless it interferes with the liberty of others. Most of us pride ourselves on the fact that we do not ask for more liberty than we are willing to concede to others. What if a priest does say things that "may lead to the corruption of morals" in our opinion? We are constantly doing that, in the opinion of all good Catholics, and it is intolerant to claim that they are not entitled to speak their thoughts as freely as ourselves.

It may be urged that what the priest says that is harmful to morals is done under cover of the confessional. This may be true, but it is a part of their religion, and this government is supposed to guarantee freedom of worship. Freethinkers generally concede that this is right so long as the exercise of this freedom does not restrict the freedom of others. Then, if we are consistent, we will not demand that others be forced to measure up to our standard of morality, by either physical force or legislative enactment, but endeavor to accomplish our object by educational methods only.

The priest is as much entitled to the right to condemn our public schools as we have to assail the parochial school. It is true the priests' condemnation is not based upon reason, but prejudice; that fact, however, does not affect his right.

I agree that the Catholic priesthood and its teachings are so vile and corrupt that the mind can hardly form any conception of the ignorance, superstition and degradation they cause; and their action correspond with their teachings. They are constantly using physical force, and striving for legislative enactment to compel others to live in accord with their teaching. Free-thought ought to make us more liberal.

THE LATE JOSEPH M. GREENE.

From George B. Wheeler, Illinois.
To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:
It is with deep regret that I send you the news of the death of Joseph M. Greene, Dorchester, Mass.

For over thirty-five years brother Greene was a staunch Freethinker, and at one time I believe was a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was the able editor of The Animal's Defender for more than ten years.

Like the late J. Howard Moore, he was a great humanitarian. He labored night and day preaching and practicing the gospel of humanity to animals.

Let me quote passage from some of his writings which will show the power and verity of his mind:

"Ye valient ones who have ever striven for principle and against a fawning policy; who have courted investigation and abhorred concealment; who have been ever willing to have your lives and actions compared with other lives and actions; who have been eager to wear the rags of honesty rather than the robes of dishonesty, and to bear the cross of honor than to have a crown of dishonor, ye are martyrs whether dead or living, but ye need no monument or mausoleum, for fairer than any marble shaft touched by the sunsets' glow, and emblematic of our honored dead is that fair wreath of gratitude which loyal hearts have entwined about your memories and dedicated to ye as an everlasting memorial and within which the love of every free born and humane son and daughter is perpetually enshrined.

Then all hail to those spirits where e'er they may be,

Who have ever discountenanced wrong, Whether living or dead, on the land or the sea,

Let their deed be recited in song. While their names with pure memory's wreath intertwined

We shall evermore keep in our sight; For within that bright garland our love is enshrined,

For the heroes who battle for right. And when cherished ambitions lie wrecked on the sand

Of life's ocean of smiles and of tears, And the voices appealing to heart and to hands

For the sea's roar no longer we hear; Yet we trust there may be at the close of life's day

As in weariness onward we plod,
Some sweet voice that will say as the mist fade away,
"He loved goodness not gold as his god."

BROOKLYN PHILOSOPHICAL ASSOCIATION.

From William Winham, Secy.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I wish to have you know that our lecture last Sunday (December 24th) was one of the best that has ever been delivered from our platform. Dr. Bowne, in selecting the title ("That Heather Festival Which the Christians Call Christmas") certainly picked out a very appropriate one; and I have been told by a great many of our members and friends that they never heard the question spoken of or lectured upon in a more scholarly manner than that, in which it was presented last Sunday. I will say further that we trust that we shall be able to have Dr. Bowne again speak for us at an early date.

AN APPRECIATION.

From W. H. Meyer, South Dakota.

Within a few weeks will terminate my first year as a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. During that time I have received a vast amount of knowledge relative to religion and the methods of propagating the various creeds. In this respect the cost of subscription has been repaid many times, and it is with no regret that I renew my subscription. I am only sorry that I cannot do more financially.

SEASONABLE COMPLIMENTS.

From Ernest Morehouse, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Damn the season's insipid phrase,
While War and Greed—

And reason rests

A REQUEST OF MRS. RICKER.

From J. C. Wibel, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I would like to request that Mrs. Ricker submit to you an article showing why the powers that be are foisting Billy Sunday into prominence in order to throw dust in the eyes of the people while they are putting military stunts through at Washington.

From Mrs. O. Phillips, New York.

Every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER gets to be more interesting and I enjoyed the last number very much. I don't get out among the people, but neighbors coming in see I have THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so I am branded infidel, and I don't deny it. I am almost 81 years old and in fairly good health. I read until I get tired, then I think and think of all the pleasant past, and this helps to brace me up. Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER.

From Geo. W. Bartlett, Connecticut.

If papers circulated according to their merit THE TRUTH SEEKER's circulation would be a hundred times greater. The lecture on the first page, December 30, by O. C. Weatherby I thought most excellent. May good things come fast to you in 1917.

Proof Positive.—On a Chicago street the following conversation was overheard between two Irishmen:

"I understand, McGuire, that ye was foined foive dollars for assaultin' Cullen."

"I was; and it was a proud momint whin Oi heard the sintince."

"And why?"

"Begorry, I'm thinkin' it showed which of us had the best of the fight, didn't it?"

The Influence of the Church on

Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

SECULAR VIEW OF THE BIBLE

From Studies of the Hebrew; with the Evidences as to Jesus.

By CONSTANTINE GOETHENBACH

Cloth, $1.10

The author of this book denies the sacred character of the scriptures, but believes that it is to the Holy Word, so-called, that we owe the various sectarian beliefs, conflicting creeds and religious dogmas of the present day. The Scriptures, he admits, are the source of much that is worthy of perpetuation, and when we rid ourselves of the idea of that they constitute a sacred book, much pleasure and profit may be derived from their perusal.

REBUTTAL OF SPIRITISM

By J. K. HAYWARD

Cloth, $1.60

English liberals since Hobbes have argued materialism, but stopped short of its final conclusion. The author takes up the subject where they leave off, and proceeds to rebut Spiritism. He has apparently made a case on the evidence, and obviously has the courage of his convictions. Nowhere in the book is there an atmosphere of propaganda or conciliation.

According to the charge filed against him, the clergyman stole bitters from a drugstore.

He took advantage of his position as prison chaplain to press his unwelcome attention on the wife of one of the prisoners.

Lowber, Rev., Smyrna, Del. Baptist. Immoral conduct with young girl.

Lowe, Rev. James T., Lancaster, Pa. Sexual pervert.

Through letters written by the Rev. Lowe to several boys of Lancaster, the police authorities started an investigation and trapped the parson in a room with a young boy at a local hotel. McGinnes, Rev. R. H., San Diego, Cal. Embezzlement.

McKelvey, Rev. H. A., Altoona, Pa. United Brethren. Criminal relations with fourteen-year-old girl.

On information furnished by the young girl's mother, the Rev. McKelvey, aged 42 and married, was arrested and jailed charged with a statutory crime. He resigned his pastorate and his resignation was accepted.

McKumey, Rev. John, Cincinnati, O. Baptist. Arrested for nonsupport of wife and four children; out on suspended sentence of six months on his promise to provide.

McLeod, Rev. Warren H., Eureka, Cal. Presbyterian. Adultery; resigned. He left town, while his wife and children were cared for by friends. The girl was a member of his congregation.

McPherson, Rev. Harold, Bridgeport, Conn. Evangelist. Stealing an automobile license; arrested and paid costs. The card of this traveling soul saver read, "Carry your cross and follow me." The court treated him leniently, and he resumed his travels.

The Rev. Mellon was charged with exercising undue influence over one Mattson in the drawing up of the latter's will.

Mills, Rev. R. M., High Hill, Mo. Campbellite. Illegal liquor selling.

Fined $300 on a charge of boot-legging, he was unable to pay and was sent to jail.

Moody, Rev. B. T., Bristol, Tenn. Methodist. Held to answer white slave charge and obtaining money under false pretenses.

Minister-like, the Rev. Moody attributes his downfall to the captivating blue eyes of another man's wife. One look into the aforesaid blue eyes and the parson forgot all about his wife. When arrested, the authorities found on his person a Bible, a pistol and a bottle of whisky.

Molock, Rev. A. Manship, Baltimore, Md. Fraudulent practice of medicine.

His sign in front of his home read "Osteopathy and Dressmaking," and after his name he carried the letters A.B., D.O., D.D. and M.D.

Morrow, Rev. R. L., Atchison, Kan. Christian. Conduct unbecoming a minister.

Ordered to leave town when it is discovered that he is engaged to two young women. His going is considerably accelerated when he learns that big brothers of one of the aggrieved women are looking for him.

Mullen, Rev. John J., Chicago, Ill. Catholic. Murderer; acquitted on insanity plea.

The acquittal of this priest was not only a vicious miscarriage of justice, it was an insult to the intelligence of the people. The Rev. Mullen, while out on a spree, stabbed and killed J. W. Patterson, station agent at Hillside, Ill. Patterson had given the priest no offense, and there was no reason for the killing aside from the homicidal impulses of this clerical thug who was a member of the missionary order of the "Precious Blood." He is reported to have entered the seminary of his order at Carthage, O. If, when next he feels the blood urge, he confines himself to the "Precious Blood," those of profane blood will not become unduly excited.

Murdock, Rev. Chas. T., Sharpsburg, Pa. Methodist. Illegal voting.

Murray, Rev. K. G., Baltimore, Md. Methodist. Sexual pervert.

This parson was prominent in social "uplift" work in Baltimore, and specialized in warring on the women of the segregated districts. He is now wanted by the police to answer charges growing out of his conduct with several young men at the Central Building of the Y. M. C. A. An associate "uplifter" of Rev. Murray, named Dr. Kelly, describes the downfall of his co-worker as a victory for Satan.

Myers, Rev. B. W., Granite Falls, Wash. Evangelical. Street fighting with another preacher in Everett; arrested.

Nash, Rev. Chas. E., New York City, N. Y. Baptist. "Copper" for a band of fake stock promoters.

As vice-president and director of the Monaton Realty Co., he used his ministerial prestige to boost the worthless stock of the company. He had unloaded one million dollars worth of paper on the "come ons" before the crash came.

New, Rev. Newo Nowi, San Francisco, Cal. Calls himself "bishop of the New Thot church." Sentenced to two years imprisonment after conviction of using the mails to defraud.

Nichol, Rev. W. S., Centralia, Wash. Evangelist. Sending explosives through the mails.

Norris, Rev. John, Chicago, Ill. Presbyterian. Adultery. The Rev. Norris, who is 54 years of age and married, was discovered in Chicago, living in a state of sin with a young woman who had formerly been a member of his congregation in Pittsburgh, Pa. Some years ago he made a journey to the Holy Land; on his return he announced that he had been sanctified and was incapable of sinning thereafter.

Norton, Rev. Robert F., Far Rockaway, L. I., N. Y. Methodist. Burglary.

Overby, Rev. Albert T., Richmond, Va. Baptist. Embezzlement.

Palmer, Rev. Francis, Trenton, N. J. Presbyterian. Perjury.

Panik, Rev. Gaspard, Bridgeport, Conn. Roman Catholic. Intemperance.

It is charged that the good man was much tempted by worldly pleasure, love of entertainment, fast autos and allied carnal pursuits, which are most destructive of that lofty spirituality demanded in God's anointed. Four hundred women of his parish formed themselves into a committee that stormed the rectory, hurling sticks and stones and demanded the priest's removal. In great anguish of soul the Rev. Panik was forced to call for the aid of the secular arm to quell the riot.

Patmont, Rev. Louis R., Newark, N. J. Baptist. Arson; held in $1,500 bail.

Peernell, "Prince" Coy, St. Joseph, Mich. "House of David." Sued for slander.

Pessinger, Rev. John, Owensville, Ind. Christian. Rape and bastardy.

The girl in the case, who is 22, complained that the minister had attacked her, a child resulting.

Phelan, Rev. J. M., Marinette, Wis. Catholic. Criminal relations with a fourteen-year-old girl.

When arraigned in court the priest confessed his guilt, saying, "I am guilty of a terrible crime." He threw himself upon the mercy of the court.

Pinas, Rabbi Samuel, Chicago, Ill. Jew. Counterfeiter; confessed and was jailed.

Pinsonneau, Rev. Delphius, McGregor, Ont., Canada. Catholic. Sued for slander by a sixteen-year-old girl.

Pirtle, Rev. Andrew J., Severance, Kan. Campbellite. Fraud.

Noted evangelist and church builder. Left Severance suddenly, leaving behind him a string of bad notes, checks, debts and mortgages. The community is said to have lost $2,500 through his fraudulent financial operations, while he left behind but $300 in assets. Was finally located in Kansas City, where he says he would go to work. His strong point seemed to be the obtaining of the confidence of the community and then fleeing it.

Pogue, Rev. W., Marysville, Cal. Methodist. Immoral conduct.

He sued his wife for divorce. Was superintendent of a Detention Home. His wife in a counter complaint accused him while there of friendship with Indian maidens and squaws, and that matrons of the institution were forced to resign "because of scandalous stories circulated about him."

Porta, Rev. Joseph, Richmond, Cal. Catholic. Made defendant in $1,000 suit brought by a man who was injured by priest's auto.

Porubsky, Rev. John, Binghamton, N. Y. Catholic. Misuse of church funds.

Posten, Rev. B. Monroe, West Chester, Pa. Methodist. Conduct unbecoming a minister; is deposed.

Powell, Rev. E. R., Geneva, Ohio. Baptist. Conduct unbecoming a minister.

The past year has been a very bad one for the believers in immersion; now comes another minister of that persuasion, charged with imperilling the morals of a young woman. Love notes that fairly sizzled with intensity of passion bore his signature. He wrote of "burning kisses" and called her his "blue bird." The parson is married and has two children.

Powell, Rev. Geo., Louisville, Ky. Baptist. Felonious assault; convicted.

Pratt, Rev. Hamlin L., Portland, Ore. Evangelical. Cruel treatment and desertion.

His wife brings suit against him for divorce.

Preston, Rev. Anthony, Ft. Wayne, Ind. Arrested for carrying concealed weapons.

Prus, Rev. Francis, Milwaukee, Wis. Drunk and disorderly; sentence suspended.

Raabe, Rev. Ludwig, New York, N. Y. Baptist. Disorderly conduct; jailed.

Ragsdale, Rev. C. N., Atlanta, Ga. Perjury.

At the trial of Dan Lenhon, representative of the Burns detective agency, charged with subornation of perjury, the Rev. Ragsdale testified that Lenhon had promised him $10,000 if he would swear on the witness stand to having heard Jim Conley, the negro, confess the killing of Mary Phagan. The minister fulfilled his part of the agreement, but said he received only $200 of the amount promised him. It was brought out at the trial that the character of the Rev. Ragsdale was "notoriously bad."

Ragsdale, Rev. Tolman R., Washington, Ind. Methodist.

He sued his wife for divorce. She filed a cross complaint, charging him with adulteries and liaisons with women too numerous to mention.

Raines, Rev. J. O., St. Louis, Mo. Baptist. Slander; found guilty.

Ramsey, Rev. J. J., Hastings, Neb. United Brethren. White slavery.

Found guilty by a jury and sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment. The identical name appears in the 10th edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." He was formerly forced to leave the pastorate of the First Christian church, Shawnee, Okla.

Reade, Rev. C. G. Harper, New York, N. Y. Obtaining money under false pretenses.

He is wanted in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., to answer charges of passing worthless check.

Redding, Rev. Baline, Chardon, O. Methodist. Assault and battery.

He beat a young girl who repulsed his unwelcome attentions, and then assaulted three men who came to her assistance. When the police arrived, they found him on his knees praying.

Rees, Rev. Seth C., Pasadena, Cal. Nazarene. Malicious slander.

The board of trustees of Nazarene University have brought charges against the Rev. Rees, claiming him to have been a disturber, slanderer and all-round pest. The most sensational of these charges is that concerning the affidavit the Rev. Rees is alleged to have obtained from a Mrs. Cornwell. This instrument is now in existence, and its contents, it is said, will startle the Nazarene community in that it involves a certain minister and a beautiful girl, a member of the church.

Reinfels, Rev. Paul, Banning, Cal. Catholic. Accused of murder.

The priest is alleged to have shot and killed Peter Glennon, as the result of a quarrel they had over a Mrs. Clara Sherer. The coroner's jury, in their desire to give the priest the best of it, intimated that Glennon might have shot himself.

Richardson, Rev. W. J., Binghamton, N. Y. Baptist. Bigamy.

He pleaded guilty, being unable to explain away one of the two wives found in his possession.

Richmond, Rev. Geo. Chalmers, Philadelphia, Pa. Episcopal. Blackmail.

The arrest of this servant of Christ followed his attempt to blackmail a young man who had served a prison sentence, but who is now striving to make good at honest employment. The preacher said the "hush money" might be sent to him as an Easter offering or as pew rent. The church authorities charge him with having attempted to blackmail Bishop Mackay-Smith out of $15,000. The bishop dropped dead as the result of the mental strain caused by the scandal. None fall so low as the godly.

Riley, Rev. Floyd, Montgomery City, Mo. Methodist. Writing an improper note to young girl; resigned and left town.

Rippe, Rev. Herman, San Francisco, Cal. Lutheran.

Sentenced to two years' imprisonment for obtaining money under false pretenses on complaint of two brother ministers.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. The announcement that we have it is sufficient.

In Best of Humor.

Contrary.—"People should marry their opposites."
"Most people are convinced that they did."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

In Court.—Lawyer—"Do you drink?"
Witness (quite huffy)—"That's my business."
Lawyer—"Have you any other business?"—Widow.

Past Finding Out.—The kaiser must be puzzled by the fact that the Almighty has seen fit to reduce the potato crop of Germany more than 50 per cent under last year's yield.—New York Sun.

Restricted.—Rankin.—My wife speaks six different languages.
Phyle—I wouldn't worry.
Rankin—Whatdye mean worry?
Phyle—She can talk only one at a time.

Heredity.—Music Teacher—Your son is improving, but when he gets to the scales I have to watch him very closely.
Mamma—That's just like his father. He made his money in the grocery business.

Easy Going.—"I shouldn't think it would be so bad living abroad."
"Why not?"
"If you can't pay your debts you just declare a moratorium. And if you are late for work you simply turn the clock back."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Preparation.—"My daughter has obtained a position in a lawyer's office. She starts on the first."
"And in the meantime is she doing anything to fit herself for the work?"
"Yes, she is reading 'Bertha, the Beautiful Blond Stenographer.'"—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Worse Yet.—A German spy caught red-handed was on his way to be shot. "I think you English are brutes," he growled, "to march me through this rain and slush."
"Well," said the "Tommy," who was escorting him, "what about me? I have to go back in it."

He Understood.—A Church of England bishop, desirous of affecting economy, was traveling in a third-class carriage with a rough-looking workman. The latter exhibited surprise at such superior company, and, consumed by curiosity, inquired:

"I suppose you are a poor curate, sir?"
"Er—no," weakly replied the bishop, "not exactly—but—but I was once a curate."
"I see," commented the other; "that 'orrid drink again.'"—Pittsburg Dispatch.

An Unhappy Inference.—A student assistant, engaged in reading the shelves at the public library, was accosted by a primly dressed, middle-aged woman who said that she had finished reading the last of Laura Jean Libby's writings, and that she should like something just as good.

The young assistant, unable for the moment to think of Laura Jean Libby's equal, hastily scanned the shelf on which she was working and, choosing a book, offered it to the applicant, saying, "Perhaps you would like this, 'A Kentucky Cardinal.'"

"No," was the reply, "I don't care for theological works."

"But," explained the kindly assistant, with needless enthusiasm, "this cardinal was a bird!"

"That would not recommend him to me," said the woman, as she moved away in search of a librarian who should be a better judge of character as well as of Laura Jean Libby's peers.—Harper's.

The High Price of Bibles.—Now what do you know about this! Here is a press dispatch taken from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

"New York, Dec. 17.—The price of Bibles has increased, and is likely to advance still further, because of the advance in the cost of paper, ink, leather and glue, due to the war."

What are the lost heathen, who are not wallowing in blood in the Christian wars, going to do if the only word on earth, or in heaven or hell, that can save their lost souls from everlasting torment climbs to such a high price that it is classed with luxuries?

All the raw material that goes into the manufacture of paper is being gobbled up by the ammunition makers to make gun cotton for the European war, and newspaper men are wondering what they are going to do for print paper if the thing keeps up much longer; but surely Jehovah's faithful servants, the war-lords, should have laid aside enough paper to supply the Bible trade.—Melting Pot.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

By Joseph McCabe

The subject is handled in a scholarly and incisive fashion from the Rationalist standpoint, and is calculated to shake the faith of the most devout Christian.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

This was issued October 19, 1915.

It was announced Dec. 31 by the French Heroes Fund, No. 200 Fifth avenue, New York city, that through the personal efforts of Mrs. William Astor Chanler, president of the fund, and Mr. John Moffat, chairman of the Executive Committee, the birthplace of the Marquis de la Fayette, in France, had been purchased and that the historic chateau would be restored and perpetuated as a memorial and museum of American and French patriotic emblems.

The Public, the Singletax paper established in 1898 in Chicago and edited for fifteen years by Louis F. Post, who is now a government official in Washington, has come to New York and taken offices at 122 East Thirty-seventh street. Stanley Bowmar, formerly advertising agent, is now publisher, and Mr. Post has relinquished his proprietary control, which he states consisted of ownership of the financial deficit. His share is now held by Mrs. Fels, widow of the late Joseph Fels, who gave largely of his substance to the Singletax cause.

When Mrs. Cynthia Westover Allen, the Rev. James B. Watson, and others, applied on Jan. 4 for a certificate of incorporation for the "International Transformation League," Mrs. Walston Hill Brown, daughter of the late Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, announced that she would appear before Justice Hendrick of the Supreme Court to oppose the incorporation. Mrs. Brown objects on the ground that the aims and objects of the projected "International Transformation League" are almost identical with those of the International Child Welfare League. She says that the similarity is due no doubt to the fact that among the projectors of the new society is Mrs. Mary E. Hitchcock, formerly a member of the Welfare League. Among the members of the Welfare League, the original organization of the kind, are Mrs. Thomas A. Edison, George Foster Peabody, Dr. Albert Shaw, Adolph Lewisohn and P. B. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education. These and many other ardent supporters of the organization, Mrs. Brown thinks, would be very much interested in the plans of the imitation concern. Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden, who founded the "International Sunshine Society," has been the most successful of those who have done a large business for themselves on the basis of very small service to others. At one time she became rather notorious through an investigation of her activities carried on in the name of charity.

Washington Secular League—

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen, Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen; And will lend grace in coming time To queens of beauty more sublime." (Impromptu by Elizer Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

DECAY OF AUTHORITY.

With Special Reference to Ecclesiasticism.

BY RICHARD ELLSWORTH.

While authority is still, to a certain extent, tenacious of its power, there is every evidence that it is in a state of decay. It is not desirable, however, that it should utterly decay, for the past will always remain something to us; and though many of its lessons have been unlearned, and no longer hold their place in the minds of thoughtful men, still we dislike to have them treated with unnecessary contempt. The world is now passing through a period of transition from hereditary, traditional authority to spontaneous, individual and social authority; the decay is the decay of irresponsible, injudicious and irrational authority.

The age is growing into a fixed consciousness that obedience to a chosen and worthy authority is not the same as blind obedience, devoid of reason. It has been one of the contradictory faults of our growing democracy that we have been slow to recognize, that while blind obedience is destructive of character, intelligent obedience may be upbuilding and helpful. The endeavor to break ancient bonds and establish new laws necessarily involves danger. In discussing the decay of authority it is necessary to recognize that, rid of old fetters, and our respect for them, we must still be willing to honor new bonds; if the power of the old regime is broken, we are under the spell of a new system, which should command our respectful consideration if we would not appear as triflers in a matter of fundamental importance.

It is logical to note first the decay of personal authority, which is manifest in the case of the decline of parental control, especially that of the father. It has progressed so far in America that we may be inclined to give a new interpretation to the saying: "The child is father of the man," since there is open rebellion everywhere against the rudeness and impertinence of the American child. "There can be no reverence unless there are objects worthy to be revered." The flippancy of the American adult would naturally rob him of the respect once enforced by a conventional dignity. It is a great mistake to relegate the word "reverence" to objects consecrated by religion. The religious connotation of the word by no means defines its complete import, albeit it stands first in order in our modern dictionaries. Originally, as in Chaucer, reverence signified honor and respect, without implying any idea of awe or fear which is the meaning given to it by the church. This is simply another instance of a splendid word being appropriated by religion to serve its fraudulent purposes to the notable deprivation of the language of every-day life.

The decay of personal authority is in no case more marked to-day than in the relation of parent and child, teacher and pupil, master and man. Were we asked for a word to define this condition we should unhesitatingly reply, want of reverence. The man who expressed his objection to that notorious character, Billy Sunday, by saying that he was lacking in reverence, defined him accurately, for he seems to have no respect for "heaven above, or for the earth beneath, or for the waters under the earth," as runs the religious story book. When the state is obliged to step in and fix an age for the beginning of the working life of the child, and the number of hours that it may continue at its daily toil without suffering injury, there is evidence enough that parental love and authority has declined in the last century. For the last few decades humanitarianism has been compelled to hedge about the father, to impress upon him his duties, to command and compel him to care for the child for whose protection and education his love has proved insufficient. There will never be developed, however, in the character of the child a proper spirit of honor and respect for his parents, his teachers and his employers, unless those adults forsake their frivolous and unconcerned ways, and by force of a dignified yet gracious manner, win the love and admiration of the younger, dependent nature, without which devotion the framework of personal authority cannot long survive.

A noticeable decline is also witnessed in the authority of the husband over the wife. Most people are still married by the old formula in which the wife promises to love, honor and obey; but an increasing number use the words as they do those of the creeds, with a reservation; while those are multiplying who are willing to place the sexes on a basis of equal authority. If there must be authority in the house, it is said, let it be a matter of function, not to be determined by sex alone, but with reference to all the interests of the home. It is only to look about, however, to find that this loss of authority by the husband has plunged us into a maelstrom of moral and social problems, not because we ought to go back to recognizing the old authority of the "head of the house," but because the newer democratic system is still undeveloped.

The decay of a permanent authority in the home has also been fostered by the greatly mistaken idea that woman is inferior to man. The absurdity of declaring one thing inferior to another when the two things are not alike in their true differentiating qualities, seems never to have entered the brain of those who have labored so assiduously in recent years to depreciate womankind. The philosopher compares things that are intrinsically alike when his aim is a perfect classification on the grounds of identity; but the neophyte in reasoning, whose aim is publicity rather than truth or edification, compares things that are not reasonably comparable, though both may be highly estimable when viewed with reference to their legitimate sphere of activity, and the excellence of the work accomplished therein. The greatest offender in this matter of disparaging woman has been woman. Woman need hope for nothing from her own sex; for the greatest condemnation pronounced against woman has been the utter inability of one woman to speak or write rationally—not to say truthfully—of another woman.

It is true that in the past the weightiest opposition to woman's rights and prerogatives came from man and religion; but of recent years this unfortunate condition of things has in part greatly changed for the better. Religion has not yet fully atoned for its injustice to woman; but man has repented to a laudable degree, and if woman is ever to come into her just share of honor and influence, it will be because man, realizing his serious mistake, has at last welcomed her to a mutual sovereignty, and to a like participancy of honor and glory. When this idea shall have taken root in the home, then we shall hear no more of the father as the "boss" or the "governor," or the mother as the "old gal," but a natural and healthy authority will pervade the entire household—no one predominating, and no one being inferior. After all, the highest authority is that gained by service, in fulfilment of the great moral truth that "he who would be chief among you, let him be servant of all."

Our next topic will be the decline of political authority. Under the feudal system the great mass of people were deprived of their personal liberty. They lived and died in one place, in the service of the feudal lord. With the first breaking away from this tyranny, the men who went to the towns risked their lives, because they lost all claim on the baron by disregarding the only responsible authority. Nevertheless, they went to the city, taking their lives in their hands, and there they organized guilds for their common protection. It was the allegiance of the city masses which strengthened royalty and annihilated the power of the barons; more than that, it was the inevitable precedent of the coming events. The divided people were incapable of resisting the power of the barons; the united people developed nationalism, and the king was compelled to concede to them the rudiments of representative government.

Representative government, as thus far developed, is as unsatisfactory as many people think the evolution of organized industry will be. "The never-ending audacity of elected persons" is the inevitable result of unrestrained representation in industry or politics. One impression we are receiving in this slow process of political evolution is, that divided authority does not mean independence. The possession of the suffrage for the choice of so-called representatives does not guarantee democracy. "The authority is, as yet, neither with the people, nor with the representatives. The hereditary power of the latter is gone; but the voice of the former is still uncertain. Traditional authority has been supplanted by a partisan, irregular, indirect authority, which makes us almost incapable of self-government. One of the problems of democracy is to get the things which require attention directly and simply before the people's minds, so that they will exercise the authority belonging to them. There is little choice between an hereditary ruler and a political boss; government ex cathedra must not be mistaken for vox populi."

It is altogether improbable in the great cities of our country which have suffered so long from divided authority that they will ever get good administration until their attention is fixed on the single council, elected at large by direct nomination, made fully responsible, and controlled by the referendum and initiative. What is true of local governments is equally true of state and federal administration. Representative government is a transitory, divided authority between the unquestioned hereditary power of feudalism and the independent intelligence of democracy. As long as this condition of distributed sovereignty exists, there will ever be imminent the prospect of the decay of political authority, when it can be no longer said that ours is a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

The decay of authority is nowhere so manifest as in the religious world. There seems to be current everywhere a feeling among men that religions of authority have had their day, and are now passing, as Sabatier says, into the religion of the spirit. The communistic colony of the early period of Christianity soon yielded to the institutional Christianity of Rome, which was the cause, doubtless, of its being spread through the world by capturing the imperial influence of that state. It was owing to this change in the spirit of religion that there gradually grew up an authority, hitherto unknown, bearing the name of church, or ecclesiastical authority. And when there was added to this spiritual sovereignty a temporal power, the result of what Dante called "the fatal gift of Constantine," there was exhibited to the world a magisterium, which for solidarity, baneful efficiency and unyielding obduracy, had never before been witnessed or even considered a possibility among men.

The effect of church authority upon the world is well understood by every careful student of history. If one would know precisely what it stands for he has only to read the "Syllabus of Errors" condemned by Pope Pius IX. The requirements of that Syllabus have always been carried out with scrupulous care and persistency. The darkest ages in the life of the world have been those in which religious authority was in the ascendant. The apologies of modern Romish writers can never atone for the rigors of the Inquisition which violated all human feelings. However, from the time when the Syllabus of Pius IX. was set forth (1864), the Roman church has been passing through a remarkable phase of disintegration, and would seem to have lost nearly a third of its dominion.

The intelligent classes in all civilized countries have to an enormous extent been estranged from that church. Rationalism and unbelief have made fearful havoc, as Pope Pius X. himself lamented, in some of the principal Roman Catholic countries—in the natural reaction from the attempt of the church to fetter reason, to stifle inquiry, to discourage scientific and historical investigation, and to bind the limbs of thought by a despotic absolutism. Setting itself in antagonism to freedom of conscience, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press, it has made modern Democracy its relentless foe, and has stimulated the growth of that very Socialism which it so bitterly denounces. These results are seen in all countries but in no one more distinctly than in Italy, the birthplace and the home of Papal authority. There, infidelity grows apace. As an evidence, witness the Italian Freethinkers' Convention held in Rome in 1904, in spite of a violent protest against it issued by the Pope—the Mayor of Rome hailing “the noble struggle of the human intellect in which they were engaged.” It was an emphatic and triumphant demonstration against the Vatican; and yet ninety-five Italian municipalities sent official representatives, or official letters of adhesion, to it.

But what of the United States? Here at least, it is generally believed the Roman church has made amazing progress—has achieved notable triumphs. In the year 1800, her strength was estimated at barely 100,000, but in 1890 it had grown to 10,000,000, and in 1913 it was variously estimated at from 12,000,000 to 14,000,000, or even more. But it is forgotten that this growth has come almost exclusively from immigration from the various countries of Europe; so that every million added to the Roman church in the United States represents a million transferred from some other branch of the Roman church—and does not represent any growth at all. On the contrary, this transference results really in enormous loss. This is established beyond contradiction by reliable Roman Catholic authorities. A memorial addressed to the Pope by some of the faithful in 1891 affirms that there were 20,000,000 descendants of Catholic immigrants to the United States, and that of these 16,000,000 had apostatized. In view of these facts, an American prelate said recently in conversation with an Irish priest that “for the Irish Catholic immigrant, America is the road to hell.” The Roman Catholic church, then, when we take a broad survey of its condition, is seen to be losing ground over wide areas, and especially in the centres of greatest enlightenment. It is not gaining, it is losing strength. It is not really consolidating its resources, it is disintegrating.

“When we note the extraordinary impotence of Catholicism in the great cities of Europe,” says Joseph McCabe in his “Decay of the Church of Rome”; “when we learn in country after country, that the middle class forsook it a generation ago, and the artisans are abandoning it to-day; when we find its authority rejected almost in proportion as a nation is touched with culture; and when we see that its larger tracts of unchallenged authority so constantly correspond with the darker areas in the cultural map of the world—we see that its power rests largely on a basis that is directly and triumphantly challenged by the modern spirit—a basis of ignorance.” As long as that church is dominated by the medieval spirit, as long as it clings to its effete superstitions, as long as it hugs contentedly the fetters of absolutism welded by the Vatican, it can never approve itself to the American people. The enterprise of “making America Catholic” is foredoomed to failure. That once gigantic authority that brought kings to its feet, that controlled the destiny of empires, that terrorized the nations into a servile obedience, has reached a stage of decadence where it is no longer feared by the humblest citizen, and only mentioned to be immediately denounced.

Nevertheless we are confronted by a real danger by reason of the presence of the Roman church in our midst, under its now prevailing auspices. That danger arises from the ambition of the hierarchy to grasp political power in the United States. It is not necessary to prove that this ambition exists among those who are shaping its destinies in the Republic. Whoever has observed their policy at all critically cannot fail to see it. So confident are they of their political power that the Western Watchman boastfully declared some time since, that any public man who opposes the Roman church commits political suicide. This boast is also a confession—a confession that the church controls the ballots cast by her partisans—controls them sufficiently to defeat those who incur her displeasure. That which makes her dangerous—that which gives her so often a controlling political influence is not her numbers, but her solidarity—the subservency of a large proportion of her adherents to the direction of the priesthood. It is this medieval sacerdotalism that constitutes our peril. The Roman priest controls the political action of a large part of his flock. Romanists invariably deny the truth of these facts, but in the words of Emerson, “Your actions speak so loud that I cannot hear what you say.”

With the decline of church authority, there arose at the time of the Reformation a new type of authority which took the form of an “infallible book.” The present reaction against the Reformation enables us to see it in a little clear perspective. The right of private judgment and liberty to read the Bible or any other book are inestimable gains, but men are beginning to see the price at which they were bought. Coincident with the Reformation was the circulation of books printed with movable types, and the popular ability to read. In consequence, not only was “the Book” substituted for the church as the foundation for authority, but authority in general began to be drawn from books. “The effect of the clear, black print on the white page is so much simpler and more vivid than other impressions for most people, that whether they derive their opinion from the sacred scriptures, secular books, or the newspaper, the authority of the printed page transcends, for those who read, all other authority. Even people who pride themselves on their independent judgment will call up from the recesses of their minds some impression, which, however unauthoritative, remains indelible because of having been seen in print.”

When to this authority of the book is added the dogma which naturally grew in the ill-tutored minds of the post-Reformation population, of the infallibility of the sacred writings (even when translated into the vernacular), there developed an authority as commanding as that of the church, but less successful because of the diversity of interpretation, due to the right of private judgment. It was inevitable that the zeal of those who found divine sanction for their personal opinions, should burn heretics. It is equally inevitable that this privilege of private investigation should lead ultimately to the destruction of both church and book. As in the case of church authority, so likewise with Bible authority we find men everywhere departing greatly from an earlier orthodoxy.

The higher criticism of the Bible which was used so effectively by Spinoza and other early writers, became both more scientific and more popular in the nineteenth century. Under the impulse of this new spirit of investigation, some of the most radical views have been put forth touching the inspiration and authority of the Bible, by men of learning and high position in the church itself. It is not necessary to-day to refer to the opinions of Strauss and Baur, who found no sanction for the inspiration of the scriptures, in order to establish a logical position for incredulity regarding those writings, for the work has been even better done by orthodox divines, and with a thoroughness which assures the results of their labor remaining. The evidence that the authority of the Bible has seriously declined during the last century is to be seen conspicuously both within and without the church, revealing to the thoughtful spectator that another and most dangerous opponent of human liberty is gradually being removed from our midst.

The reasons for this decay in Catholic church-authority and Protestant book-authority may be looked upon as the result of the study of comparative religion, humanitarianism, and the changed attitude regarding the personality and cosmic service of Jesus. The study of comparative religion reveals the fact that the great religions of the world are very similar in their origin, their fundamental teaching, and their influence; that the spirit underlying them all is approximately the same. It has also brought out the fact that in some important particulars the older religions were superior to Christianity, as for instance, in the matter of persecution, some of them, as Buddhism, knowing nothing of persecution. If there was nothing new in Christianity, and nothing particular to be gained by believing its tenets, it followed necessarily that its authority must become decadent, and its hold upon men's minds gradually relinquished. Men soon learn to abandon that which they can no longer use.

A new humanitarianism has also had its effect upon the immoral teaching of the Christian religion. Men have now learned to measure the sacred by its moral value. The scriptural doctrine of hell is incompatible with humanitarianism. The idea that one could commit any offence in the brief span of human life which would warrant eternal torment, was not only unable to stem the tide of disbelief in hell, but seemed to acquiesce in the idea which Carlyle castigated, that not content to be without a hell, the English people had devised “the hell of not making money.” The social doctrine of the twentieth century promises to force upon the church an even superior hell, which Charles Ferguson calls “the hell of not making good.” It has long been felt by the decent man that the doctrine of hell is absolutely unnecessary for the strengthening and up-building of his character, and if it be necessary, as the church affirms, for the right expression of the justice of God, then there is nothing to be done but to abandon the thought of God also; for a God that would require the establishment of a hell in order to vindicate his righteousness, would be a God unworthy of the contemplation of the lowest of the beasts that perish.

A third cause for the decay of religious authority is seen in the changed opinion now entertained by intelligent men regarding the personality of Jesus. It has been well established that there is no mention of the Jewish Messiah outside the book called the New Testament. This conclusion led scholars to examine critically the books called the Gospels, which resulted in establishing the fact that the earliest of these books was written many years after the date assigned for the ministry of Jesus. The striking fact here brought out is this: That notwithstanding the unprecedented stir occasioned by the preaching and miraculous works of Jesus as reported in the synoptic gospels, there is no contemporaneous mention of him either in sacred or profane literature. But it is not necessary to urge this argument in order to prove the fact that many men of today no longer show any respect for the authority of the Christian's God. Christians themselves have never agreed as to the attributes which constitute the person of Christ. Every reader of church history is familiar with the unseemly controversies which continually arose in the early and later church regarding the true notion to be held with reference to this new world-savior. History informs us that the highly important matter of his divinity was not agreed upon until the assembling of the Council of Nice, more than 300 years after Christ was born.

From the early conception of a God to be worshiped, many Christians look upon Christ to-day as simply an ethical teacher, whose beautiful philosophy of life it would be a mistake to utterly reject. We cannot afford to lose the vividness and the uplift of the wonderful character of Jesus, they say, and, happily, he is brought nearer to the multitude by the reverent but scientific investigations and teachings of today than by the authoritative dictum of earlier, unlettered theologians, whose concern was for church and dogma more than for the permeation of society with Christian ethics. It is on these lines that Professor Nathaniel Schmidt wrote his striking book: “The Prophet of Nazareth.” It is typical of the way in which the most critical modern research may be combined with a rarely beautiful and inspiring spiritual picture. But the fact remains that the influence of Jesus as a religious authority among men has suffered many modifications and changes during the last century, and there is little hope that the medieval picture of him will ever be revived save among the ignorant and prejudiced.

The decay of personal, political and religious authority is ominous. There is the inevitable danger of apathy, rash scepticism, or cynicism. The struggle of the privileged to maintain their prerogatives on tottering foundations leads the superficial thinker to attack men of straw. “When authority is identified with injustice, tyranny, hypocrisy and superstition, the logical protest is anarchy. The new authority must be that of the spirit,—the spirituality of comradeship, of cooperation, of universal suffrage and direct legislation, of democratic culture and democratic religion.” This is the aim of Rationalism, the hope of the liberal-minded man. When humanity shall have risen above the fear of self-constituted religious authority, and shall center its thought and action upon its own amelioration here on earth, then shall the true happiness of the race really begin, and the promise of a peaceful and productive future be assured. The hope of the world lies in Reason, not in faith; in Truth, not in error; in Love, not in piety.

Every virtue has its privilege: for example, that of contributing its own little bundle of wood to the funeral pyre of one condemned. — Friedrich Nietzsche.

Supposed Prophecies Dissected

Dr. Homer Wakefield has practically abandoned his original contention that the quoted passage in Josephus is spurious, by failing to refer to it. He is now solely concerned about making the most graceful exit possible without admitting discomfiture. His long argument to enforce the conclusion that the Jewish scriptures and Christian gospels are a borrowed composite is, as far as I am concerned, entirely a work of supererogation. That is like trying to force an open door. Every Rationalist knows it. I have myself contributed much to disclose this fact. In my lecture on "The Gospels Unveiled" I said distinctly that the gospel Jesus was made to fit the prophecies, by twisting them out of their manifest meaning and making them allegorical. By a new collocation I revealed their real import as describing the forlorn condition the Jewish superstition had brought its adherents to, and showed that the Psalms referred to events that David could by no possibility have known. This primal superstition that David wrote the Psalms was the cause of the subsequent delusion of Jesus, Paul and the Jews and gentiles generally.

All god-men are necessarily mythical. I take no more stock in the truthfulness of the evangelical record than Mr. Wakefield does. It is because I reject more than Paine, Ingersoll, Waite, Renan, and others that I deny the superior morality of Jesus. With his narrow Jewish creed it was utterly impossible for him to have enunciated the Golden Rule. That rule is based on human equality, which Jesus denied. The gentile writers put that rule in the mouth of Jesus, as also the supposed-to-be god-like doctrine of non-resistance, which no human being could practice and live. If I attempted to make a consistent Jesus out of the gospel narratives I should have to invent, not two, but a half dozen distinct and separate characters. If I could, I would reject the whole contradictory story as baseless. It is the minimum of what I must believe and not the maximum of what I can believe that I seek. I must believe, from the uniformity of quotations taken from separate sources, that the evangelists drew from earlier records. When Paul and Luke attribute the same words to Jesus, it is a certainty they drew from a common earlier source, whether that source was true or false. They were, as one of them puts it, trying to express "what is commonly believed among us." It is beyond the bounds of reason to hold that a gentile could have invented the Jewish Jesus, or a Jew the gentile one. The gentiles have embellished this Jesus. All through their diverging story the original Jewish skeleton is still visible. Statements and concessions that invalidate their own superimposed myths and embellishments are yet to be found scattered throughout the record. These are given blindly and unconsciously. The original Jesus was a frequenter of synagogues. He venerates them by calling them "my house." Those insubordinate to Jewish church discipline were to be treated as "heathens." He believed implicitly in "Moses, the law and the prophets." He said "not one jot or tittle of the law shall pass away," something that no gentile would ever have conceived or invented, for the passing away of the law was the supposed means of his own salvation. To overcome the original, the writer of John added: "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," implying that neither grace nor truth came by Moses. Jesus echoed this law when he said, "Such measure as ye mete shall be measured unto you again." The same idea is in his prayer taken from the Talmud. He believed the Jews were the blessed meek who should inherit the earth, based on the Psalm: "I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possessions." All outside the Jewish lineage were to him "swine and dogs" whom they were instructed not to give the children's bread to nor cast their Jewish pearls before. The Samaritan woman confirmed the custom by stating that "the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." The parable of the Good Samaritan must then be a spurious gentile addition. The Acts of the Apostles confirm this Jewish narrowness at that time by putting into the mouth of Peter these words: "Thou knowest how it is unlawful for any man that is a Jew to keep company with or come unto one of another nation." This narrow, strait-laced, creedal Jesus, to whom the gentiles have imputed the Golden Rule, exemplified its practice by saying: "Go not by way of the gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not." He no doubt had the same opinion of them that the Boers had of the negroes when they said to Livingstone he "might as well preach the gospel to the monkeys." "I come not but to the lost sheep of the House of Israel." To restore the kingdom to this lost Israel was his sole ambition. To be thought "great David's great son" was the aim of his preaching, that he might be considered the promised Messiah. "Abraham's bosom" was his final heaven. Such is the skeleton which no man can harmonize with the gentile Jesus. And the Acts of the Apostles furnish a complete refutation of the claim that he ever sent his disciples into all the world to preach. The disciples are there shown to have had no knowledge of such instructions. Paul gets them in an alleged vision, and for doing so he was shunned and called a liar. In piling these books by numerous writers together, the Catholic church has unconsciously given us all the evidence needed to refute their own falsifications.

The origin of this natural Jesus nobody knows, and guesses are useless. The two evangelists who try to fix his birth are ten or twelve years apart. Both among Jews and gentiles, in all ages there have been guesses, and sometimes forgeries, because the creedal Jesus has exercised an immense influence on history. He stands to it as Mrs. O'Leary's cow stood to the Chicago fire.

DAVID ECCLES.

Chat from Chicago.

The old fellow, 1916, was almost dead; the youngster, 1917, was near the threshold. Accordingly, we shouted, "Le roi est mort, vive le roi!" It was Saturday, one night before Christmas Eve. The occasion was Virna's celebration of her mother's birthday. There was nothing bibulous about it—no intoxication save that of the senses in beholding the charms of the beautiful danseuse Virna Harmon Walker. Except for the absence of "the rosy," all was laissez faire. There was no pousse-café. There was plain coffee accompanied by mountains of sandwiches, also cakes that melted in your mouth, made by Virna's own dainty hands. Yes, siree, Bob, she's one of the best cooks in the country—but I'd advise no man to try to get her.

Virna is the daughter of E. C. Walker, of New York and Sunrise Club fame, and Lillian Harmon, whose father was Moses Harmon, all three of whom endured ostracism, persecution, and imprisonment for unpopular opinions, which opinions are now endorsed by all intelligent people. Were Moses Harmon alive today he could not be a martyr again to save his life. "The world do move."

It was not a Puritan Sabbath that dawned on the dancers, as they flung themselves recklessly through the mazes of the old, almost forgotten Virginia Reel. You would hardly believe that Libby Culbertson Macdonald came near being the giddiest dancer of them all. It was fortunate that a sanctified Sunday had no terrors for these lively Sabbath-breakers. Let joy be unconfined! was the motto. Down with the medieval Memento mori! (Remember death!) Up with Goethe's Memento vivere! (Remember life!)

Ere long, I predict, Virna Walker will flash across the dramatic sky, a decided success as artist and money-getter. I would not willingly wound E. C. Walker's amour propre. He is a man of great intellectual ability, but, bless you, it is confined to the top of his head, finding expression only at the lips, while his daughter speaks eloquently from every part of her body, from her golden-brown curled head to her twinkling feet. Interpretative dancing requires the persistent and arduous training of every limb, every muscle, if one would show the thoughts that prompt one. Pantomimic art is a great test of ability. Unquestionably Virna is actress in pantomime as well as danseuse.

The brains of the Freethinker lead him to success in any desired direction. Irene Foote Castle, granddaughter of E. B. Foote, Sr., and Virna Harmon Walker, granddaughter of Moses Harmon, are both examples of what can be done in the Terpsichorean art.

The very young boy, George O'Brien, grandson of Moses Harmon, is a chip of the old Freethought block, as he proved to be in a fine oratorical rendering of Horace Traubel's appreciation of his grandfather. This he gave at the Harmon Memorial several weeks ago, which, I regret to say, I failed to report for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot predict that little George will be president some day, but I can safely say that he will, if he choose, be an A-1 orator.

Sam Atkinson, gentleman, in all that the word implies, as well as highly gifted speaker, will blow into Chicago in about two weeks. Mrs. Atkinson is already here. At this party of Virna's, Libby Macdonald, in Dutch costume, executed a broom dance in which she showed the assembled guests how she would clean up her floor, walls, and ceiling against Sam's coming. It is her intention, circumstances permitting, to give a Freethought or Rationalist social for Doctor Sam, as the film companies have dubbed him. Virna Walker will be her invaluable assistant. At this affair no one will dare to be "wise." Quite otherwise, anyone attempting to talk shop will be hurled into outer darkness.

Sam Atkinson's Rationalist work with the film companies is not duplicated by any of our speakers. That he reaches an enormous number of hearers, of the great orthodox unwashed, is due to the fact that he delivers his short lecture before each presentation of the picture, thus making five or six speeches each day to very large audiences. "Protect Your Daughter" is the film he now lectures with in Denver, greatly to the disgust and condemnation of the Denver dominies, who showed their fighting abilities. The newspapers were full to overflowing with comments pro and con. Lots of publicity is what Sam got and desired.

We don't know yet what Sam will be up to in Chicago, but it's dollars to doughnuts he'll make good somehow, so we must join his procession and emulate the Parisian gamin at the time of the French Revolution. Being besieged by friends to join them in an "eat," the gamin said as he hurried away, "Can't do it. I belong to the procession. I'm the boy to cry, 'Down with Polignac!'" We're in Atkinson's procession, we're the gamins and gamines to cry, "Down with the film censors! Down with reactionary priests and sky-pilots!"

At my party I'd dearly love to have the great English Parliamentarian, author and lecturer, Francis Neilson, who is the sensation of the hour in Chicago. But, dear me, M. P. is such a ticklish title to tackle. Do you know, he actually bowed to me across the table at a recent banquet without being introduced. Wasn't that a perfectly grand condescension on his part, he a live M. P.?

H. Percy Ward will do a turn at this party. He has to, because I have boosted him in every issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Of course, I've been laying my pipes this long while to get him. If he does not come, I'll "get him!"

Among those present (a hackneyed phrase) will be Clarence Darrow, the adorable. (It is whispered that he is worshiped by the fair sex. Sh!) I have my doubts about his coming. He's angry at me, maybe, since my write-up in last TRUTH SEEKER, in which I was so bold as to say, "All right, Clarence, we'll see whose cat's got the longest tail."

I am certain that Col. E. A. Stevens will be present, for he is eager to get his last impromptu poem off his chest. He's some poet, I'd have you know, and he always looks the part to perfection. The sterner sex cannot be "dolloed out" too much to suit me.

I'm especially desirous that "Bill" McGee should be there. I want the sensation of seeing how it will seem to fox-trot with a real, live, flesh-and-blood ex-priest Rationalist.

I do want in the worst way to be honored with the presence of George Burman Foster, of Chicago University fame, and author of a great book on Nietzsche, but there! that pernicky paragraph I wrote about him in last TRUTH SEEKER will spoil it all. Besides, he will want a stronger limelight than I can give him.

What of E. C. Wentworth? I'm sorry to admit that I'm not in his class, nor he in mine. He's got entirely too much money. It would be like inviting "Jawn D." to a banquet of wieners and sauerkraut.

Everybody will look with envy on the slender, fairylike form of E. C. Reichwald as he executes a pas seul. He does not know what that means, but never mind, he'll do it, all right.

It is worthy of note that my youngest speaker, so talented and withal so lovable, Marshall J. Gauvin, gave a lecture on "Rationalism, the Religion of Reason," before the Pittsburgh Rationalist Society in the Academy Theatre, Sunday, December 10th. Four hundred copies of this lecture were sold in fifteen minutes at the close of the lecture. He's "going some," is "Marshy." Nevertheless, this man of the hour would be persona non grata before "Jawn D.'s" Chicago University professors, George Burman and Clarence.

LIBBY CULBERTSON MACDONALD.

No man leaves the world in all things as he found it. The habits which he was instrumental in forming may go on from century to century, an heirloom for good or for evil, doing their work of misery or of happiness, blasting or blessing the country that has now lost all record of his memory.—W. R. Williams.

A Word for a "Catholic Critic."

I received a letter the other day that made me think. The writer of the letter informed me that he was a "Catholic," and said that I "wrote too much against Catholics." It is very unfortunate that one cannot criticize Roman Catholicism without being denounced for "saying something against Catholics," as my correspondent put it.

There is no body of human beings so closely allied to their religious faith as Roman Catholics. A word against Romanism is taken as a personal criticism, by every follower of the Pope. I know of nothing decent in Roman Catholicism, but I know of a great many decent Roman Catholics, and I refuse to regard them as being as bad as their faith. It is unfortunate that men allow their religious faith to dictate their lives to such a controlling degree. The common motto of religious people seems to be: Love me, love my religion. But if this motto were put into practice I fear that very little love would some persons get.

Now, I could not, unless under the tortures of the Inquisition, accept Roman Catholicism, because, to my mind, it is the essence of every diabolical conception. More than that, it makes no appeal to the intelligence, the reason or the common sense of man. There is only one word which defines Romanism; that is faith. All one has to do is to believe, to be a Roman Catholic. All the virtues are less than belief. Nothing will save man but faith, and to be saved is the only important thing in the eyes of Romanists. A certain politician once said that a Roman Catholic would fight for his country but would die for his church. It is true that most Roman Catholics know no country but their church. This was truer in earlier centuries than in the present one, when the church governed the world. What I most criticize in Roman Catholicism is the arrogance of its priesthood and the lickspittle obedience of its congregations. I not only criticize this damnable conspiracy against human rights and human liberty, but I condemn it.

A man may belong to a church, but a church should not belong to a man. The Roman Catholic church belongs to a man, to the Pope. Millions of human beings bow to that man's word, and obey it. That is the curse of Romanism.

Roman Catholicism is opposed to mental independence and is thereby the enemy of human progress. It is because of the attitude of Romanism towards the present civilization, and particularly toward our free government, that one is justified in criticising Roman Catholics, who, by their support of this religion, are aiding and abetting disloyalty to our country.

Our people have either been blind to the doings of Romanism in this land, or have failed to grasp the true meaning of this ecclesiastical monster. There is one imperative duty of American citizens henceforward, and that is to oppose Roman Catholicism in its every endeavor, for every word and deed of this religious vampire is directed at the red heart of our nation. L. K. W.

Altruism.

The spirit of altruism belongs entirely to man and nothing analogous to it can be found in the animal kingdom. Unselfishness cannot be explained more than by saying it is one of those moral functions that derived reactive pleasure by administering to the needs of others. Every intelligent man is guided consciously or unconsciously by some motive; and, were this not true, there would be utter confusion not only in the moral sphere but every other realm of activity. To say that man is selfish in being unselfish is essentially true; but this is a form of selfishness that is legitimate. A man who relieves a helpless case of suffering does so in obedience to his higher impulses; and this is love of the good of a fellow-man. If he obeys this impulse by deeply desiring the relief of the sufferer, he can assume that he himself will be the better off. But the good of the fellow-man comes first; then selfish pleasure follows consciously or unconsciously. Such motives are wise because they stimulate greater effort.

The truest and best things are always given and never are bought. The most valued friendships are those which we acquire free-handed, and which we have never sought to win by conferring some favor. We too frequently attempt to buy true friendship with money. All we can do is to prepare ourselves for receptivity by self-denial. The laws of the altruistic nature of man command vicarious suffering, and the whole human family is indissolubly bound by a bond of sympathy. Never in the history of the world has human sympathy been more active than now, and the millions donated to charitable purposes almost double each year. Men of money are more than ever beginning to realize that their wealth is a trust than can best be discharged by giving to the needy. The masses now have greater opportunities and advantages than the wealthy class had a century ago, and it would seem that a great class of men is just now beginning to awaken to a sense of moral obligation.

Law abiding citizens must be taxed to restrain and care for the criminal. Poverty will continue to afflict the human race while commercialism thrives on the country. If pauperism were to cease, there would be no incentive for good men to make money in order to do good. No government is supposed to be so narrow as only to administer to its own needs. The government bureaus supply, gratuitously, valuable printed information to any one who asks for it. The most valuable medical and surgical clinics in the world are free to members of the medical professions who wish to learn more, and these advantages could be sold for a price. The greatest discoveries in medical science have not paid the discoverer a penny of royalty. No one can reasonably attempt to show that he has paid his way in full to the world. He can never discharge the debt of gratitude that he owes to his self-sacrificing mother. He cannot remunerate the government for the protection that is given. He may boast of his American liberty, but it was dearly bought with his great-grandfather's blood. True manhood is absolutely altruistic in its nature.

Rome and Christian Unity.

Wonders will never cease, especially in the ecclesiastical world. We are now being treated to the spectacle of the Roman Catholic church about to make overtures to the Anglican and Russian churches in behalf of church unity.

The practical reason assigned for this move is the great success which followed the work of the American Episcopal Commission which has been laboring in Russia for some time in order to bring about under ecclesiastical auspices a closer relationship between the Orthodox church and the Episcopal church in America. A friendly intercourse had existed between these churches for many years, but a definite understanding had never been reached as to unity of doctrine and exchange of priestly functions. The last efforts made by the Episcopal church met with great success in Russia, and the official organ of the Holy Synod praised the initiative of the world conference begun by the American church, and exhorted the Russian hierarchy to give their cooperation to it.

The interest of the Vatican in the problem of Christian unity has been aroused by this success, for "of course, Rome cannot see with indifference the growing friendship between Anglicanism and Orthodoxy." In the changed condition of international affairs, and the crushing blow Christian orthodoxy and Christian morality have received as the result of the war in Europe, the pope is very much concerned lest the strength of his own constituency suffer serious loss when the war is over; and so he is ready to embrace friendships which his predecessors utterly spurned, and to make alliances never before heard of in the history of the papacy. "Misery makes strange bed-fellows!"

The startling news, however, in this changed attitude of the pope is seen in his expressed desire to open afresh the question of Anglican ministerial orders which had been definitely settled—as everyone supposed—by a Papal Bull of the late Leo XIII. In 1896, William Gladstone and other eminent Englishmen, lay and clerical, importuned Pope Leo to exercise himself for the unity of Christendom, and in particular to consider the Anglican church as a true branch of the church Universal. The pope appointed a commission to inquire into the validity of Anglican orders which led to a definite and final condemnation from the Roman Catholic point of view.

Now we are suddenly told in despatches from Rome that the present movement would be directed particularly toward the establishment of a reunion of the Russian church and the Papacy, and to a thorough re-examination into the validity of Anglican or Episcopal ordination. This at once raises the question of Papal infallibility. What is the sense of a formal pronouncement of a pope whether viewed ex cathedra or otherwise, when, after being declared a "final judgment," the question decided upon is again opened for a "thorough examination," just as if it had never been previously considered! The world knows, however, the craftiness of Rome, and that in all her proceedings she is careful not to burn the bridges behind her. In Pope Leo's condemnation of Episcopal orders we will doubtless hear the explanation that the pronouncement was not ex cathedra, or infallible, but simply the declaration of an individual pope, which is capable of modification should additional facts make it necessary.

It would be interesting to know when the gift of infallibility was ever used by a pope. Perhaps the only instance was when Pius IX. promulgated the absurdity by declaring himself infallible. The pronouncement of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary in 1854 is looked upon by Catholics as the only instance thus far of an infallible utterance given by a pope; but we fail to see any infallibility displayed in this decision, for the final action was the result of a depleted council, and methods of coercion which would have disgraced a popular political meeting. The truth of the matter is, that the infallibility of the pope is one of the most complete pieces of nonsense ever conjured up by the human mind. If it has any applicability to the affairs of "faith and morals," why, in the name of common sense, is it mankind is not kept from constantly falling into error when dealing with those questions, which is its present lot.

The most interesting feature in this latest news from Rome is the striking change in the policy of the Papacy since the time of Leo XIII. in dealing with the other Christian bodies. In 1896 the English church appealed to Rome with reference to Christian unity, and begged the pope to consider seriously the claims of Anglicanism. Rome's answer was a condemnation. Now, in 1917, without any appeal from the English church, we have the spectacle of a pope seeking to ingratiate himself into the favor of the Episcopal communion, and showing a strange readiness, all unsolicited, to reconsider an unfavorable pronouncement made by one of his predecessors against that church. Verily the times have changed, and Rome, which never changes, like everything else, has changed with them.

It is now the turn of the Episcopal church to take its inning. A public announcement on the subjects here considered is expected shortly from Rome, and there can be no doubt that everyone, religionist and non-religionist alike, will be interested in hearing what this old-time sinner has to say regarding the changed conditions of our modern day, and the modified policy it purposes to extend to them. An infallibility that could not determine the cause of the present war, and that had nothing but talk for its prevention and a vacuous neutrality to thwart its further continuance is, of course, only worthy of a smile; still it will be interesting to learn what the "funny man" of the Vatican has in mind for the unification of Christianity, for it is always pleasing to learn what a person, who has been the most conspicuous instrument in the destruction of an institution, proposes to do in order to heal the division. The world awaits with patience the next message from the "prisoner of the Vatican."

Mark Twain: His Humor and Philosophy.

Mark Twain has made a world of people laugh. When shown such statements he pretended great egotism and said it did not do him justice, for his humor was not confined to mere man; that many animals enjoyed his extraordinary wit. He tells of a hungry camel in Egypt that ate up one of his books and came very near dying of laughter from it.

He was more than a humorist: he was a critic and a philosopher. In his "Jeanne d'Arc" he demonstrated his ability as a biographer and a tragedian. In his book, "Christian Science," he shows himself a master of critical analysis as well as of satire.

His philosophy was set forth in his book, "What Is Man," published privately in 1906, but not sold until after his death. There were but two hundred and fifty copies published, and now they are rare and costly. For this reason it is deemed advisable to quote some of the striking passages from this great work.

His philosophy is that man is a machine. He says: "Whatsoever a man is is due to his make, and to the influences brought to bear upon it by his hereditaries, his habits, his associations. He is moved, directed, commanded, by exterior influences solely."

"The mind," he tells us, "was built up out of impressions and feelings, gathered from books, conversations, and traditions of centuries of ancestors. And this borrowed material is automatically assembled by mental machinery, in accordance with the law of causation." He says: "Your mind is merely a machine, nothing more. You have no command over it, it has no command over itself—it is worked solely from the outside. That is the law of its make; it is the law of all machines."

Mark Twain was an egoist. He thought that the impulse in a person was his master, therefore there was no self-sacrifice in his actions. He tells us that "from his cradle to his grave a man never does a single thing which has any first and foremost object but one—to secure peace of mind, spiritual comfort, for himself."

He says men pretend to self-sacrifices, but such acts have no existence. A man may think he is sacrificing himself for others, when in fact he is working for his own satisfaction, or "to content a requirement of his own nature and training," as he puts it. He states the case of self-sacrifice very strongly. "The mother will go naked to clothe her child; she will starve that it may have food; suffer torture to save it from pain; die that it may live. She takes a loving pleasure in making these sacrifices. She does it for that reward—that self-approval, that contentment, that peace, that comfort. She would do it for your child if she could get the same pay." That is, the woman felt better from doing what is called duty than she would have felt if she had shirked it.

Then he pays his compliments to conscience as a guide. "There are all kinds of consciences, because there are all kinds of men. You satisfy an assassin's conscience in one way, a philanthropist's in another, a miser's in another, a burglar's in still another"; and his conclusion is that, as a guide or incentive to moral conduct, it is valueless. He cites a number of instances where men got pleasure out of conduct that gave others pain, but when it resulted in pain to himself he regretted that conduct. When their pain gave him pain, he quit.

While showing how our consciences drive us this way and that way, owing to our different dispositions, he insists that it can be changed by education; that the peaceful individual can be made warlike. He says: "But you train them and put them through a campaign or two; then they would be soldiers; soldiers with a soldier's pride, a soldier's self-respect, a soldier's ideals. They would have to content a soldier's spirit then, not a clerk's, not a mechanic's."

Prof. Jacques Loeb of the Rockefeller Institute, who besides being a Monist and a Freethinker is one of the most eminent men of science in America, was a speaker at the science congress in New York last week. His subject was "Biology and National Existence," being an attack on "the claims of war enthusiasts who insist that from the biological viewpoint wars are justifiable or even desirable." The statement, he said, "that a nation by not going to war will lose its inherited virile virtues is not supported by our present biological knowledge." Nor are "the struggle for existence" and the "survival of the fittest" any such laws of nature that they may be invoked in this instance. Professor Loeb called attention to the argumentation of Houston Chamberlain, a "racial biologist," after quoting whom he said: "He is certain that Christ was not a Jew and seems to incline to the belief that he was a German, but he hesitates to commit himself too definitely on this point." German theologians, including the German emperor, have said much, since the war began, to give the impression that God is a Teuton, which would lend some support to the Chamberlain theory. Professor Loeb asserted that "science is holding the keys of the future"; that "qualities and achievements of nations are due less to governments than to grandmothers"; and "I find," he said, "the duty of society is to conserve as its most valuable asset, human material, and to prevent the endless heaping up of the great mass of human wreckage and garbage which is the shame of our civilization."

In its relations to the war, Christianity is more and more disgracing itself. Its clergy have, throughout, been inciting slaughter and blessing cannon and air-ships. This was in Europe. Now in America they are pursuing the same course. In some Eastern cities a score of clergy have issued a public protest against the president's proposal of peace. On their action, the Hearst newspapers of the 3d inst. said: "This is the thing that drives men from churches. . . . men who persuade themselves that it is their Christian duty to oppose peace in Europe are temporarily out of their normal senses. They are absolutely unable to hear testimony fairly, to weigh facts fairly, to state facts fairly or to reach fair conclusions. They see red all the time. They thirst for revenge and would kill and burn and torture to satiate their savage passions—and they are so far gone in furious unreasonableness that they attribute to God almighty himself the same ulcered and cankered heart and soul that make them beside themselves with rage and hate." The idea in those last words should have been carried a little farther and deeper. It should be added that this is the origin of the whole Christian scheme of imposing, for no offense at all, an everlasting punishment in a hell of rage and hate.

Chauncey Depew, who has been living on borrowed time for many years, has offended the religious susceptibilities of a correspondent of the Atlanta Georgian by saying that King David, who died comparatively young, might have lived longer if he had led a more creditable life. Mr. Depew is accused of adopting a rule for longevity which reads: "Disbelieve in the inspiration of the Scriptures, and cast stones at any Biblical characters whose lives were not as flawless as that of Chauncey M. Depew." There has been no previous intimation that Mr. Depew is not strictly orthodox. But King David must suffer much in the estimation even of good Christians when his moral character is compared with the worst of modern sovereigns.

General Funston has succeeded in saving soldiers from the revivalists. Has New York no Funston?

Book Notes.

"Sinai and Olympus: Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture," by a Texas Pagan, is a most interesting publication by the Truth Seeker Company, which amidst other enticing books is in danger of being overlooked. The text of the work is of the most serious character, but the many illustrations which accompany it are very humorous, but drawn with a skillful pencil. The purpose of the author was to trace some of the most popular myths of Greek and Hebrew story to their original sources, and to show the striking likeness that exists between them. This feature is an unusual one in books of this character, as most books on mythology deal with the myths of a particular nation, and give little attention to a comparison of mythologies except it be that of Greece and Rome.

Among the religious myths considered by the author are: The Divine Genealogy; Celestial Wars; Creation and Fall of Man and Woman; Mythical Deluges; Human Sacrifices; Hercules and Samson, and Arion and Jonah. All these are treated in a brief, popular and convincing manner, and the facts are so stated as to fix themselves readily in the mind. Among other chapters are Minor Similitudes, The Olympian Court, and A Glimpse of Sinai. The book closes with some specially didactic chapters which many will consider the most valuable part of the work. The titles are as follows: Forms and Frauds in Worship; An Exodus of Divinities; Theological Anomalies; Jewish Rejection and Pagan Acceptance of Christianity; and Utility of Religion. It is in these chapters that the author moralizes on the truth or falsity of religion, and discusses its utility as a means of uplift to man and society in general. These chapters are the result of a personal experience, and are well worth the price of the book.

The work is illustrated throughout by a clever artist who has caught the amusing side of the narrative in a truly comic way. While at times his pictures are grotesque, they rarely fail to be funny, and are rather better in a general way than similar pictures found in the usual publication intended for popular use. It is a book to be enjoyed both in the text and in the illustrations. The price is 50 cents.

Boston's Paine Anniversary.

The Boston Freethought Society will celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, on Sunday, January 28th, at 3 P. M. Addresses will be made by Marilla, M. Ricker, L. K. Washburn, Thomas Maher, and J. P. Bland, and all are most cordially invited. Mr. Washburn's address will be on "Should Jesus Come to Boston Now?" and it will subsequently appear in full in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The German emperor's New Year's address to his army and navy is an acknowledgment of the assistance of Divine Providence in defeating the Rumanians. In his account with God the kaiser gives Jehovah credit for everything agreeable that happens, and charges nothing against him—such things, for example, as the year of disaster at Verdun or failure on the Somme. Such bookkeeping is devout, but not honest. The kaiser promises his men, "God also in the future will be with us." The words are as idle as the deity they invoke.

A daily paper in Los Angeles solicited the advertisement of the Liberal Club under promise to print extracts from addresses delivered. After thrice breaking the promise, the management finally stated frankly that it could not be kept, for while the paper feared a boycott by Christians, it knew it was in no danger from the exercise of such bigotry by Freethinkers. Thus the Christians leave to unbelievers the practice of the injunction against spite which was meant for themselves.

The slander of some people is as great a recommendation as the praise of others.—Fielding.

SCOPE OF BLASPHEMY LAWS

BLACKSTONE'S CRITICS.

By THEODORE SCHROEDER.

Having disposed of Blackstone as an "authority" on the meaning of our American constitutional free speech, we may proceed to use him as a means of clarifying the issues that were fought out between those who were content with the conditions approved by Blackstone, and those who sought intellectual liberty, as that was afterwards assured by our constitutions. If we can get a clear view of the essence of the controversy between them, we shall have an exact understanding of that which our constitutions were meant to prevent in future. This may or may not give us the whole of the meaning of mental liberty, but it will surely give us one aspect, or one indispensable factor of our guaranteed liberty of speech and of the press. It may be that absence of previous restraint is another such factor, or was but one of several different methods by which the more fundamental principle was denied. So, then, for the purpose of making clear the pre-revolutionary historic issues over intellectual freedom, and for the purpose of showing what intellectual freedom meant to those whose views were incorporated into our American constitutions, we will state a little more at length the defenses for censorship as that was regarded at about Blackstone's time, and then contrast that with the opinions of Blackstone's critics.

The Defense of Censorship.

Then, as now, the advocates for the suppression of unpopular opinions refused to see that, to admit the existence of the power to suppress any opinion, is, in the long run, more destructive to human well-being than the ideas against which they would have the powers exercised. Then, as now, the alleged immediate public welfare was the justification for every form of censorship, and some dangerous "tendency," only speculatively ascertained, and usually so in a feverishly apprehensive imagination, was always the test of guilt. "The most tyrannical and the most absolute governments speak a kind of parental language to the abject wretches who groan under their crushing and humiliating weight." (Erskine in defense of Carnan.) To make this clear it is necessary only to quote a few passages from a publication dated A. D. 1680, written in defense of the abridgements of freedom of speech and press. Sir Robert L'Estrange, in "A Seasonable Memorial in Some Historical Notes upon the Liberties of the Press and Pulpit," quotes Calvin as saying: "There are two sorts of seditious men, and against both these must the sword be drawn; for they oppose the King and God himself." He then exhibits the evolution of dangerous tendencies by these words: "First, they find out corruptions in the Government, as a matter of grievance, which they expose to the people. Secondly, they petition for Redress of those Grievances, still asking more and more, till something is denied them. And then, Thirdly, they take the power into their own hands of Relieving themselves, but with oaths and protestations that they act only for the Common Good of King and Kingdom. From the pretense of defending the Government, they proceed to the Reforming of it; which Reformation proves in the end to be a final dissolution of the order both of Church and State."

... Their consciences widened with their interest. ... First, they fell upon the King's Reputation; they invaded his authority in the next place; after that they assaulted his Person, seized his Revenue; and in the conclusion, most impiously took away his Sacred Life. ... The Transition is so natural from Popular Petition to Tumult that the one is but a Hot Fit of the other; and little more than a more earnest way of petitioning. ... They Preach the People into murder, sacrilege, and Rebellion; they pursue a most gracious Prince to the scaffold; they animate the Regicides, calling that execrable villany an act of Public Justice, and entitling the Holy Ghost to Treason." (In addition to "A Seasonable Memorial," see for similar argument "A Discourse of Ecclesiastical Politic, wherein the Mischiefs and Inconveniences of Toleration are Represented," London, 1670.)

This argument, backed by the historical fact, is unanswerable to the point that to permit freedom of criticism of religion or of government and its priests or officials, and to allow the presentation of petitions for the redress of grievances, is to permit that which tends to promote actual treason or rebellion. It follows that those who were demanding the opportunity to express their sentiments in criticism of official conduct and petitions for redress, were in effect demanding the right verbally to promote treason with impunity, because that was the demonstrated tendency, more or less remote, of all reformatory effort. That freedom, with its attendant dangers, is exactly what unabridged freedom of speech and of the press meant to its advocates, and our constitutional guarantee for an unabridged freedom of utterance was a final decision in favor of that view and against all mere psychologic crimes, including even verbal "treason." In other words, the friends of free speech contended with Sallust that, "Liberty with danger is to be preferred to servitude with security."

Heretofore we have seen the views of those who believed in the absolutism of government, and all liberty as a revocable limited liberty by permission. Our constitutional guarantees of liberty of speech and press were manifestly designed to secure some other conception of liberty, some irrevocable and inalienable right. What were the practical, essential and fundamental differences between these two conceptions of freedom?

Every censorship so far has made its defense behind question-begging epithets of undefinable meaning. In the language of Blackstone, already quoted, by means of subsequent punishment everything should be suppressed which can be characterized "dangerous and offensive writings," adjudged to be so because of a "pernicious tendency." This also was the excuse for laws creating restraint previous to publication. The friends of free speech always denied that a mere "pernicious tendency" was a sufficient excuse for suppressing or punishing unpopular ideas.

Of course the determination of the existence of such a psychologic tendency before its fruition in actual or material injury, or in an overt act which is capable of inflicting it according to the known laws of the physical universe, is to make the law a mere matter of guess-work. Just so soon as we get away from scientifically established fact into the infinite sea of metaphysical speculation, every semblance of "law" disappears. Many have reasoned about atheism and agnosticism as Bishop Horsley did about Unitarians. He said: "Unitarianism being heresy, even the moral good of the Unitarians is sin." (See: Dunlap, Defense of Abner Kneeland, p. 125.) Of course it must be so, because their every moral virtue made the major sin of their heresy more alluring, and so more effective for evil. The processes of balancing the psychologic tendencies of an opinion in the minds and the emotions of an undefined hypothetical reader or hearer of the future is a task which the most skilled psychologist probably would not have the courage to undertake. Those who know the least about mental and emotional mechanisms are the most certain about their ability to decide such questions, and those who are the most intense in their moralistic vociferations upon this subject are, of course, the least capable of making a dispassionate study of that which they understand so little. Such a task requires the highest of specialized scientists, not moral sentimentalists.

A review of the opinions of the defenders of unabridged free speech will show that, aside from arguments for its morality and expediency, the essence of their contention was an opposition to making excuse for suppression, or the test of criminality, to depend upon an uncertain guess about the problematical, speculative, and prospective, psychologic influence of an idea upon a mere undescribed hypothetical hearer or reader of the future. The demand was that the jurisdiction of the magistrate should be withheld until that assumed psychologic tendency had ceased to be a mere matter of imagination, by having been expressed in an overt act of disorder doing actual and material injury.

Furneaux on Toleration.

Now we come to an exposition of the views of those who rejected Blackstone's defense of absolutism in the tyrant,—those who stood for free speech, and whose agitation crystallized in our constitutional guarantees upon that subject.

First and chief among the critics of Blackstone's conception of toleration was the Rev. Philip Furneaux (1726-1783). This learned dissenting divine not only induced Blackstone to modify his views somewhat, in the later edition of his Commentaries, but was also a principal factor in securing a more liberal attitude of the English government toward dissenters. (Vol. XX, Dict. of Nat. Biog., p. 331.) His pamphlets in favor of unabridged free speech grew into a book and appeared in several editions.

Here, then, is the statement of the Rev. Philip Furneaux. He says: "For if the magistrate be possessed of power to restrain and punish any principles relating to religion, because of their tendency, as he must be, if he be vested with authority to punish on that account, religious liberty is entirely at an end; or, which is the same thing, is under the controul and at the mercy of the magistrate, according as he shall think the tenets in question affect the foundation of moral obligation, or are favorable to religion and morality. But, if the line be drawn between mere religious principle and the tendency of it, on the one hand; and those overt acts which affect the public peace on the other; and if the latter alone be assigned to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, as guardians of the peace of society in this world, and the former, as interfering only with a future world, be reserved to man's own conscience, and to God, the only sovereign Lord of conscience; the boundaries between civil power and liberty, in religious matters, are clearly marked and determined, and the latter will not be wider or narrower, or just nothing at all, according to the magistrate's opinion of the good or bad tendency of principles.

"If it be objected that when the tendency of principles is unfavorable to the peace and good order of society, as it may be, it is the magistrate's duty then, and for that reason, to restrain them by penal laws; I reply that the tendency of principles, though it be unfavorable is not prejudicial to society, till it issues in some overt acts against the public peace and order; and when it does, then the magistrate's authority to punish commences; that is, he may punish the overt acts, but not the tendency, which is not actually hurtful; and therefore his penal laws should be directed against overt acts only; which are detrimental to the peace and good order of society, let them spring from what principles they will; and not against principles, or the tendency of principles.

"The distinction between the tendency of principles, and the overt acts arising from them is, and cannot be observed in many cases of a civil nature, in order to determine the bounds of the magistrate's power, or at least to limit the exercise of it, in such cases. It would not be difficult to mention customs and manners, as well as principles, which have a tendency unfavorable to society; and which nevertheless, cannot be restrained by penal law, except with the total destruction of civil society. And here the magistrate must be content with pointing his penal laws against the evil overt act resulting from them. . . . Punishing a man for the tendency of his principles is punishing him before he is guilty" (pp. 52-55, ed. of 1770).

These sentiments of Furneaux, and even the very language in which they are expressed, are so in conformity with the Virginia Religious Liberty Statute as to leave little doubt that the latter was taken from the former. "Jefferson himself said there is not an original thought or word in the Religious Liberty Statute. (V. IG, Pub. Amer. Social Soc., p. 78). I continue to quote from Furneaux:

"For though calumny and slander, when affecting our fellow men, are punishable by law; for this plain reason, because an injury is done, and a damage sustained, and a reparation therefore due to the injured party; yet this reason cannot hold where God and the Redeemer are concerned; who can sustain no injury from low malice and scurrilous invective; nor can any reparation be made to them by temporal penalties, for those can work no conviction or repentance in the mind of the offender; and if he continue impenitent and incorrigible, he will receive his condign punishment in the day of final retribution. Affronting Christianity, therefore, does not come under the magistrate's cognizance, in this particular view, as it implies an offence against God and Christ" (pp. 70-71, 2d ed.).

Let me continue to quote from Furneaux' Letters to Blackstone even at some length, so as to give a more accurate view of the attitude of those opposed to Blackstone's views. After this longer sample, we will content ourselves with more brief extracts from other writers of similar views.

"So that the particular reason on which you ground the 'indecentcy of reviling the liturgy,' namely, that it is 'setting up private judgment in opposition to publick,' appears to me to be very inadequate and unsatisfactory."

"The next article in the composition of this crime, namely, reviling the common prayer, is, you say, 'arrogance.' It is 'arrogant to treat with rudeness and contempt what hath a better chance to be right, than the singular notions of any particular man' [Blackstone]."

Where Reason surrenders to Dogma, the exponents of that dogma will claim unreasonable prerogatives. Irresponsible dogmatists have never failed to pursue the interests of their creed at the expense of the interests of mankind.—Felix L. Oswald.

Witnesses to Christ.

Mr. David Eccles' reply to my comment (TRUTH SEEKER, November 25th) in your issue of December 16th affords me an opportunity to correct my misinterpretations of the intent and purpose of my communication. I endeavored to set forth the danger of assuming at this time new interpretations of the scriptures which are based upon the reading of same as it now appears to us, and to cite as examples some conclusions of other accredited writers which are diametrically contrary to those of Mr. Eccles. I do not personally essay to decide which of them is correct, but rather affirm that they cannot all be true. As a matter of fact, I endeavored to avoid taking sides.

I have been brought up practically a Unitarian, and I may add my manhood has been spent in affiliation with the Unitarian church, either here or in New York City, where I have lived eighteen years, attending the Church of the Messiah under Dr. Collyer and John Haynes Holmes. This denomination I have but recently abandoned for Rationalism.

As a former Unitarian and a newcomer into Rationalism, perhaps I may be permitted to state my prime object in answering Mr. Eccles' article. I have read Prof. Drews' "Historicity of Jesus," J. M. Robertson's "Pagan Christs" and "Christianity and Mythology," in addition to Mangasarian's "Is Christ a Myth?" Remsburg's "The Bible" and "The Christ," Sawyer, Renan, W. B. Smith, and other works that have submitted evidence along these lines.

A friend showed me THE TRUTH SEEKER containing Mr. Eccles' article which I answered, requesting a comment on it. I wrote as I did to draw out Mr. Eccles, and made the citations I did to see what he would have to say regarding them, not as my "thunder." Personally I have entered this forum with an unbiased mind, open to conviction. I can't conceive of a true Rationalist as assuming any other attitude. I took the position that Mr. Eccles has submitted theories and data which are opposed to those submitted by these other writers. I am not personally a theologian, or even a biblical research critic, as are the authors I have read, yet I want to see this important question threshed out on such evidence as the real standard-bearers of the two sides of the question can muster. Each argument should rest on its own merits and the personal equation should be omitted.

Now let us reconsider the case of Josephus as evidence of the historicity of Jesus. It would appear from Mr. Eccles' statement, that in one of the versions of Origen he is made to allude to a reference to Jesus by Josephus. Yet the fact that the one published by the Benedictines did not contain it would seem to point to the conclusion that it had been interpolated in one, but not in the other. The fact that Origen did not include a reference to Josephus as evidence of the historicity of Jesus in his reply to Celsus, although freely and repeatedly quoting from Josephus of evidence concerning James the Just, would tend to imply that the addition of "the brother of Jesus, him called Christ," was a later event. In the words of Prof. W. B. Smith: "That he never calls it in evidence is morally conclusive proof that he did not know of its existence, which can only mean that it was not in Origen's copy of Josephus."

Prof. Smith cites a third passage in Origen, "Titus demolished Jerusalem, as Josephus writes, on account of James the Just, the brother of Jesus, the one called Christ" (Contra C. II, 13 fin.), which he says is still found in some Josephus manuscripts but is wanting in others. That does not look good to me. In addition to Photius, the patriarch of Constantinople of the ninth century, whom I mentioned in my article of November 25th as finding no reference to Jesus in his manuscript of Josephus, Prof. Drews cites that Vossius, in the sixteenth century, had a manuscript of the text of Josephus in which there was not a word about Jesus.

Among the early Christian fathers and apologists who did not cite Josephus as historical evidence of Jesus, in addition to Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria, Prof. Drews cites Cyprian. Among contemporary writers who did not mention Jesus may be named: Philo (30 B. C. to 50 A. D.) the Alexandrian philosopher, who mentioned Pilate and the agitation among the Jerusalem Jews and represented his coreligionists at Rome where he pleaded to Caligula as the envoy of Alexandrian Jews. He exhibited affinity for the Jewish Gnostics, and fully described Cainites.

Mr. Mangasarian directs our attention to the fact that Philo visited Jerusalem at the time Jesus was stated to be teaching and working miracles in that city, yet in all his works he never mentioned Jesus. In Mr. Mangasarian's words: "In one place in his works Philo is describing the difference between two Jewish names, Hosea and Jesus. Jesus, he says, means savior of the people. What a fine opportunity for him to have said that, at that very time, there was living in Jerusalem a savior by the name of Jesus, or one supposed to be or claiming to be a savior. He could not have helped mentioning Jesus if he had ever seen or heard of him."

Justus of Tiberias, another contemporary of Jesus and more closely located geographically than Philo, being not distant from Capernaum, wrote a chronicle of Jewish kings, extending to Agrippa, which according to Photius, who read it through in search of references to Jesus, made no mention of him.

The expression, "Josephus did not acknowledge Christ," in my first article, which Mr. Eccles in his reply takes occasion to interpret as alluding to the acknowledgment of Christ as a savior, was not quoted, but was a personal one. Mr. Eccles will have now to carry this interpretation to original sources to sustain his postulate that it was an intention of Josephus so to state.

It is not entirely clear just what Mr. Eccles meant to imply by his statement that Origen proves the falsehood of Eusebius' forgery, but it may be stated that Origen died several years before Eusebius was born. Mr. Eccles' spirit displayed in his ejaculation: "In spite of Origen and all the church authorities I insist that this 'brother of Jesus' was actually stoned to death, and could not live afterward as 'James the Just,'" is unfortunate. To me it matters little whether or not Mr. Eccles is right or wrong in his theories, except to get at the truth of the matter. But if he is wrong, as certainly appears from the evidence so far submitted, I should be sorry to have them prevail as truth.

If I were to offer a personal opinion based on the evidence thus far adduced, it would be that Origen, not Eusebius, was the forger of the second reference to Jesus in Josephus, and that Eusebius was the interpolator of the first and grosser forgery only. Origen was evidently hard pressed for evidence in substantiation of the historicity of Jesus, in his discussion with Celsus, and notwithstanding that he did not provide it for that exigency, he thrice later referred to the so-called second passage in Josephus, each time making slight variations in the text. This hypothesis is submitted entirely on its own merits, and there will be no heart pangs or resentment if it is disproved by some bit of evidence I may have overlooked.

Mr. T. W. Doane in his "Bible Myths," page 564, gives the following list of ancient writers who would have referred to Jesus or his disciples, as such, but have not done so:

A.D.	40 Philo.
	40 Josephus.
	79 C. Plinius Second, the Elder	} Philosophers.
	69 L. Ann. Seneca
	79 Diogenes Laertius
	79 Pausanias	} Geographers.
	79 Pompon. Mela
	79 Q. Curtius Ruf.
	79 Luc. Flor.	} Historians.
	110 Cornel. Tacitus
	123 Appianus
	140 Justinus
	141 Aelianus

It appears to be provided by Mr. Eccles' theory that the crucifixion story is a myth, and inasmuch as Jesus was not crucified, yet being a historical character, he continued to live until the year A. D. 68 or beyond. Also he holds that the texts of the gospels, which he accepts as reliable history, imply that Jesus was alive on that date.

Mr. Eccles remarks: "It was this implication that led me to conclude he lived until after the death of Zacharias, A. D. 68, or two years before the destruction of Jerusalem." He continues: "The writer of Matthew did not make a chronological blunder in this reference, as was supposed, but, as in the case of other evidence of a Jewish Jesus that did not meet the gospel narrative, quoted without perceiving its pregnant implications."

"To prove this text a forgery, Dr. Wakefield will have to furnish a reason why it was forged. He will have to show that the whole chapter is forged," etc. Here we have a return to the old question whether or not it is incumbent upon Rationalists to do more than mobilize and marshal the evidence necessary to make a critical survey of ecclesiastical institutions. I wish again to emphasize the fact that the moment one begins to fabricate modifications of scripture, after expurgation of that which has been proved false, he is lost.

Mr. Eccles' persistence in quoting scripture as far as it suits his theory and purpose as reliable history, at the same time admitting that most of it is fabrication and myth, is certainly paradoxical. How he is able to discern just which passages are true and infallible and which are false and mythical, must remain an enigma to those who are outside the pale of his confidential information. Perhaps if he would permit us to peruse his inside information we could come to an amicable unity of opinion. The rest of us poor mortals are dependent upon earthly evidence as we find it, and are not free to repudiate sound evidence and the rules of logic for arbitrary selections of holy writ.

A priori reasoning is always unfortunate, for it tempts one to gather and reject evidence with a particular object in view, rather than consider all evidence for an impartial verdict. When one states to his fellowmen the result of his deliberations as an established fact, he not infrequently comes to grief and is angered at those who submit evidence against it with the best intent, whereas when he simply offers a hypothesis for general consideration, in a public forum, he does not feel grieved or angry if it proves to be a "house of cards." That is the way in Science. Every problem, every theory, impersonally stands entirely upon its own merits and is submitted under the laws of the survival of the fit. If it has not survival value, no one bemoans its elimination. Every hypothesis must stand on its own legs or fall. In the words of Dumas, "theories are like crutches. To find out their value we must try to walk on them." We cannot any more throw to the winds evidence or factors which are incompatible with our theories, then we can rise to supernatural means in compensation for inadequate crutches.

In conclusion, the "doctor" made no guesses, but endeavored to illustrate the weakness of theories advanced, by showing they were out of joint with the weight of evidence, and that other interpretations were as a propos as those submitted by Mr. Eccles. The doctor had no gods or credulities, no theories or authors, to sustain. To sift out the truth was his only object in the beginning, and the establishment of a Scientific system of discussion was the sole motive force to the conclusion.

More Pay for the Chaplain.

MR. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House resolution 413.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the Rev. Henry N. Couden, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, the sum of $300, as additional compensation for the fiscal year 1917.

MR. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the Chaplain of the House at the present time receives $1,200 a year. A number of Representatives on the floor have insisted that the present Chaplain is entitled to better recognition, and a resolution was presented and referred to the Committee on Accounts asking that for this fiscal year the amount be increased $300, making it $1,500; and after investigating the matter the committee came to the conclusion that it was proper recognition.

MR. COX. How much does the Chaplain of the Senate get?

MR. LLOYD. I do not know.

MR. COX. I think he gets only $1,200 a year.

MR. MANN. He gets $1,200.

MR. COX. I think that is what he gets. The present Chaplain of the House gets a pension, does he not?

MR. LLOYD. I do not know.

MR. MANN. He does.

MR. COX. I understand he gets a pension of $72 a month.

MR. LLOYD. If he gets a pension of $72 a month, he gets it because he deserves it.

I ask for a vote.

THE SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.—Congressional Record, Dec. 21.

Billy Sunday and Jesus Christ.

Billy Sunday's is a Christianity undiluted and unmixed with the scientific evolution of a Darwin, the agnosticism of an Ingersoll, the materialism of a Herbert Spencer, or the monism of an Ernst Haeckel. His is naked untruth in the raw! He would damn to doom or drive to divinity. His weird wailings of woe do often drive to drink. The intellectual intoxication of this ex-baseballist basely bawling forth his religious wares in the revival auction-rooms of interdenominational orthodoxy would be a comedy of errors were it not a tragedy fraught with woe.

All religions founded on highly flavored hallucinations are propagated either by hot-air machinery or instruments of iniquity and tools of torture.

But Billy Sunday is the most real Christian in the world to-day. He is a true follower of Jesus Christ, and if we use the deadly parallel we will see that Sunday's stuff is only the Christianity of Christ modified and made over by the slang of the twentieth century and the vulgarisms of the Billy Sunday tongue.

We are not now concerned whether Jesus Christ was myth, man, or miracle, but taking the New Testament as it is translated we institute the deadly parallel between Christ's sayings and Sunday's revival ravings, and we see that Sunday and Christ are religious brothers in creed and dogma, both peas from the same pod of philosophobia, both branches from the same vine of paranoiac power.

Billy Sunday says:

I will admit that Christianity seems to have fallen away, but love is the dominant principle of it and love has never been defeated.

Jesus Christ said:

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and pray for them that despitefully use you (Matt. v, 43, 44).

Billy Sunday says:

You have heard some of these mutts ask, "What would Jesus do if he were here today?" He'd skin 'em, that's what he'd do.

Jesus Christ said:

Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I come not to send peace, but a sword (Matt. x, 34).

Billy Sunday says:

God, the Unitarians say you lie. Why don't you kill 'em, God?

But is that any worse than Christ, who according to St. Mark once said:

He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned (Mark xvi, 16).

It sounds offensive to our refined and civilized ears to hear the most prominent soul-chaser of the day make the following assertion:

If a minister believes and teaches evolution he is a stinking skunk, a hypocrite and a liar.

But really, is that any worse language for this day and age than that used by Jesus Christ in his day on several occasions?

But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come (Matt. iii, 7)?

The following verses from the 23rd chapter of Matthew show what a lovable character Christ was to those whom he regarded as enemies, or the people who would not accept his teachings without questions.

But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against them: for ye neither go in yourselves, nor suffer ye them that are entering to go in.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves (13-15).

While Billy Sunday's language is not very choice, I personally do not know which I would prefer, to be told by a Mr. Sunday that I was "a hypocrite" and "a liar," or to be called "a hypocrite" and "a child of hell" by Mr. Jesus Christ. I think that one is an insulting as the other.

In the 16th and 24th verses of this 23rd chapter of Matthew, he calls these scribes and Pharisees "blind guides," and in the 17th and 19th verses they are "fools and blind."

Listen to his condemnation from the 23rd to the 29th verses of this chapter and then do not forget that this is the sweet and loving Jesus who is speaking:

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithes of mint and anise and cumin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.

Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess.

Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and the platter, that the outside of them may be clean also.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness.

Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous.

And in the 33rd verse he asks them:

Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?

Really, the meek and gentle Jesus must have been suffering from a brain-storm just then!

But is Billy Sunday's vituperation any worse than that of Jesus Christ, Billy simply using the word "skunk" for the Christly terms, "serpents" and "generation of vipers"? While Sunday's animal is the more ill-smelling, Christ's "serpents" and "vipers" are the more poisonous.

Again, why should not Sunday think that if Christ were here "he'd skin 'em," for was not Jesus a man with a terrible temper?—although the Christians excuse the manifestation of such temper by calling it "righteous indignation." This 23rd chapter of Matthew not only gives an exhibition of his temper, but we remember the chiding he gave his mother, his charging into the temple like a wild bull into a china-shop and hurling therefrom those whom he designated as "money-changers"; also in the cursing of the barren fig-tree, which according to the story, curled up and withered away. (Read Matt. xxi, 12-21.)

Again, if one will read this 21st chapter of Matthew he will ascertain in the beginning thereof that Christ was a horse-thief, or at least he instigated his disciples to steal a colt for him, and if the owner or owners objected the disciples were to say that the Lord had need of such an animal.

While Billy Sunday, the White Hope of Christianity, never needed a colt or anything like that in this age of automobiles and locomotives to ride into Boston or New York or Chicago or anywhere else, he did need ideas at one time pretty badly for a Memorial Day address, and so he stole those of Colonel Ingersoll, the Prince of Infidels and King of Agnostics. These Sunday palmed off as his own in a great oration one memorable Memorial Day; and the joke of it is, that he imitated Christ so far as to accuse some of his own disciples of giving to him the colonel's classical oration. Christ's disciples stole the colt for him. Christ rode thereon into Jerusalem. Sunday's disciples steal Ingersoll's address for the "Rev." Mr. Sunday; and this latter gentleman rides into a little ephemeral fame thereon. How similar!

The New Testament narrative does not record what became of this historic colt, whether after the ride of Christ into Jerusalem his disciples returned the stolen animal, whether Christ sold it and kept the money for "the good of the cause," or whether the colt got lost or died. Ingersoll, however, has been doomed to hell; and Billy Sunday has doomed him there. If Ingersoll has gone there, we are sorry for Billy, because, Ingersoll being in hell, Billy cannot get any new ideas worth while without going down into hell for them.

Taking the New Testament as it is, Sunday's vulgarity and name-calling are thoroughly Christian, for in the former he has the Bible, the most indecent religious book in the world, as his guide; and in the latter he need only follow in the footsteps of Jesus as given in the 23rd chapter of Matthew to be not only thoroughly and positively Christian, but Christlike in his manner and character.

JOHN A. MORRIS.

What has been the fate of the Pagan gods will be the fate of the Christian deity. Christianity, which supplanted the ancient faiths, will, in turn, be supplanted by other religions. On two continents already the cross has gone down before the crescent. The belief in Christ as a divine being is passing away. The creeds, as of old, affirm his divinity, but in the minds of his more enlightened followers the divine elements are disappearing. What was formerly believed to be supernatural is now known to be natural. What were once living verities are now dead formalities. Slowly and painfully, but surely and clearly, men are becoming convinced that there are no divine beings and no supernatural religions—that all the gods, including Christ, are myths, and all the religions, including Christianity, human productions.—John E. Remsburg.

Virtue in its grandest aspect is neither more nor less than following reason.—Lao-tse.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The Catholic church is nothing if not an imitator of the things that bring profit and publicity to other institutions. This was plainly seen when she undertook to form her present code of doctrine and practice from the older religions that preceded her, as for instance, Buddhism. Nothing in the history of religion is more interesting than the likeness between Romanism and Buddhism. In the line of this fact it has just been announced that for the first time in the history of the Catholic church in America, a mission will be held at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York City, beginning January 28th, in the hope of converting non-Catholics to the faith. It is said that "this movement towards conversion will be furnished by the Knights of Columbus and will be as thorough as any campaign launched by Billy Sunday." There are two thoughts that will occur to everyone after reading this announcement, namely: The marked change that has come over the Papal church that she finds it necessary to copy from Protestantism, and: The loss in membership that she is experiencing which requires her to resort to methods of increase after the style of the "trail-hitting" plan. The namby-pamby Romanism of Cardinal Gibbons and the Paulist Fathers which is largely responsible for the Protestant intincture which is exhibited in much of American Roman Catholicism, is by no means the true stuff. It is only another instance of the purposeful adaptability of that organization to conform itself to various conditions of religious life, in order to gain by a temporary sacrifice, a greater advantage. But the announcement undoubtedly reveals the fact that Romanism is declining in this country; and that there is a fear in the Catholic church that Protestantism is on the increase, and that this increase is largely due to the defections from the ranks of Rome to those of its enemy. Statistics would go to show that this fear is well-founded.

Orthodoxy being correct ideas sanctioned by some accepted authority, it naturally governs not only religious faith, but social, political, and economic beliefs. The similarity of the influence of the various orthodoxies may be appreciated if we speak of religious orthodoxy as devotion; of social orthodoxy, as conventionality; of political orthodoxy, as loyalty; and of economic orthodoxy as class-consciousness. In religious orthodoxy we find on the one hand devotion to dogma, and on the other devotion to sect. It is just as well that students of ethics should see that it is commonly action that determines thought, conduct which determines faith. It is no doubt true that some people's profession is better than their lives; but, taking society as a whole, its conduct is often better than its faith—it is frequently more humane. For example, in England, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the law imposed the death penalty for the stealing of a sheep or of five shillings. But the judges were more humane than the law, and gradually the law had to be modified. The conventional, the orthodox expression in legislation, had to accommodate itself to human conduct, which was better than the legal dogma.

Men are constantly complaining of their rights, but most of the rights we call inalienable are political rights, seldom associated with every-day comforts, necessities and pleasures. How can a person who talks through his nose be enthusiastic over the right of free speech? Of what good is freedom of the press to those for whom reading is harder than sweatshop toil? How futile the right to trial by jury, if physical defects make a person unable to do what the law expects! Who would not exchange right of petition for ability to earn a living? Among the rights now denied a large percentage of our children are the right to health, the right to schooling that educates, the right to industrial efficiency, the right to a body capable of enjoying life's battle and efficiency's reward. These are the rights that should be given careful consideration, not primarily in the school and other public institutions, but rather in the home under the care of the mother with the aid of a family physician.

The Illinois law forbidding the use of public schools for religious purposes was cited to the Chicago teachers as a warning against holding Christmas exercises in their school rooms. We have not heard whether or not the law was disregarded. But the festival called Christmas by Christians might be observed in a wholly secular manner, according to its origin, which is astronomical and has no more to do with Christ than the equinoxes.

THE CLERICAL ROUND UP

(Concluded)

A More or Less Incomplete List of Members of the Christian Ministry Against Whom Charges of Crime or Misconduct Have Been Laid Since Last Report.

While the clergy, Catholic and Protestant, do not admit that morality saves anybody hereafter, they are accustomed to insist that religion is its bulwark. "Without religion," says Cardinal Gibbons, "there can be no morality," and so in the pious mind irreligion and immorality are closely associated. The men who are named in this partial list of clerical delinquents are representative teachers of religion—men who, as a religious paper has said, expend so much energy in phrasing morality that they have none to devote to the practice of it. The accumulation is taken from newspaper clippings forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER in the past year or so. Some are undated, but they all belong, it is believed, to the years 1915-16, mostly '16. Each paragraph gives, in their order, so far as is known, the name, residence, denomination and offense charged.

Rivers, Rev. Joseph, Georgetown, Ky. Evangelist. Running a blind tiger.

The reverend gentleman, who is colored, stated that he engaged in his unlawful calling because there was more money in it than in saving souls.

Robinson, Rev. N. G., St. Louis, Mo. Libel; found guilty by a jury in U. S. District Court.

Robinson, Rev. J. Milo, Asbury Park, N. J. Congregationalist.

His wife brings suit for $50,000 damages against Mrs. Inez J. Patterson of Wanamass, N. J., for alienating his affections from her.

Romes, Rev. Wm., Pikeville, Ky. Baptist. Election fraud; convicted and fined $150.

Rood, Rev. Perry, Cadillac, Mich. Evangelist. Larceny; convicted and jailed.

Rudolph, Rev. Walter, Springfield, Mo. Baptist. Suicide.

Ruskin, Rev. John H., Viola, N. Y. Evangelical. Burglary; arrested.

The charge is that he entered a house in Ramapo and stole $280.

Russell, Rev. Chas. T., Philadelphia, Pa. Evangelist. Kidnapping.

The mother of a seventeen-year-old girl charged that the reverend gentleman immured her daughter in a religious institution which he controlled. The accused clergyman, now deceased, achieved notoriety as "Pastor Russell of the Billboards." He peddled a new interpretation of the Bible.

Rutt, Bishop Albert B., Chicago, Ill. Menonite. Arrested for being drunk and disorderly.

Sampson, Rev. Holden E., Somerville, N. J. Episcopal. Petty larceny. Arrested for stealing chicken corn from a neighbor.

Sarafino, Rev., Gary, Ind. Catholic. Criminal assault on 14-year-old girl.

The police are looking for this shepherd, as they say he was a prolific correspondent with young girls in his locality. No doubt the good padre will resist to the utmost this attempt of the secular authorities to "take God out of the hearts of the children."

Schenck, Rev. Halieck F., Manasquan, N. J. Methodist. Improper conduct with sixteen-year-old girl.

Schiller, Rev. Dr., Freeport, Ill. Fraudulent use of mails; convicted and sentenced to four years in Federal prison.

Schrader, Rev. August, Los Angeles, Cal. Using the mails to defraud.

The Rev. Schrader is an associate of "Divine Healer" Schlatter, who has been in trouble with the police on previous occasions owing to his fondness for money that others have worked for.

Schulte, Rev. Herman F., St. Louis, Mo. Roman Catholic. Suicide.

Schwimler, Rev. William, Calverton, L. I. Methodist. Cruelty and wife desertion.

Mrs. Schwimler asks for separation, alleging that her reverend husband refused her a doctor when she had rheumatism, and treated her himself with assault and bad language, and then left her.

Scott, Rev. C. W., Lawrence, Mich. Congregational. Accused of improper conduct with sixteen-year-old girl; resigned under fire.

It seems that the Rev. Scott undertook the reformation of a sixteen-year-old female of wayward tendencies.

Scott, Rev. Walter, Monroe, N. Y. Christian. Improper conduct; resigns.

Seen strolling through the woods with a pretty female member of his congregation, the Rev. Scott soon after resigns. While the church trustees admit that there is nothing morally or legally wrong in the pastor's walking through the woods accompanied by a young woman, they still maintain that much depends upon the manner of his strolling.

Shipway, Rev. Wm. J., Philadelphia, Pa. Evangelist. Arrested for nonsupport of his wife.

Shrout, Rev. S. J., Los Angeles, Cal. Russellite. Lewd act with seven-year-old girl.

Accused of improper conduct with little child, the Rev. Shrout, preacher of the "Millennial Dawn" and associate of Bill-board Russell, said: "I have been twenty-two years in the service of the Lord. To have such a charge made against me now is probably meant as a testing in the fire of life."

Siebert, Rev. Joseph, St. Louis, Mo. Catholic. Defendant in a breach of promise suit.

The defendant, the Rev. Siebert, sky pilot of the church that never changes, is well known in St. Louis—how well known we would not venture to state. The young woman who asks for twenty thousand dollars to assuage her grief says she was wronged under promise of marriage. The holy man has a brand new defense, one that only a "Protestant pup" or a "blatant Atheist" could fail to see the truth of—he says he is being blackmailed.

Silverbrand, Rev. Edmond, Omaha, Neb. Methodist. Disturbing the peace; arrested.

He became so offensive while making a "dry" street speech that the police took him in.

Slaughter, Rev. Madison C., Oroville, Cal. Baptist. Criminal assault on fifteen-year-old girl; sentenced to fifteen years in prison.

There were some most extraordinary features to this case. The girl testified that she was sent to the pastor by her mother to be instructed in sex matters; she says he took advantage of that fact to accomplish her betrayal. The girl's parents refused to believe her story and said they had implicit confidence in the clergyman's honor and integrity. The defense introduced a letter in which the girl, Gertrude Lamson, repudiated her story involving the pastor. After deliberation for sixty-six hours the jury in the first trial of the preacher was discharged. They stood eight to four for conviction. Feeling in the town where the case was tried ran very high and the Rev. Slaughter was hanged in effigy. The second trial resulted in conviction of the minister. The case on the whole is a very unhealthy one and the Slaughters and Lamsons would be all the better for a little rational air and sunlight. It would take a Havelock Ellis or Theodore Schroeder to properly diagnose this mess of religious eroticism.

Smith, Rev. Arthur Maxson, Oakland, Cal. Unitarian. Sued for divorce.

In a suit brought by his wife the Rev. Smith was accused of philandering with a young lady who is described as a "dashing blonde." She is also said to be a minister's sister. The parson claimed it was his double that caused all the trouble; he contested the suit and lost. In a letter to his wife he wrote: "Perhaps I was intended to be a Mormon"; and again, "The horror of my situation was the perpetual conviction that I could not really belong to two women and keep my soul whole." As to the entirety of his soul, we can't say, but we have a sneaking suspicion that he'd have a rather lively time maintaining the wholeness of his body under circumstances such as he speaks of.

Smith, Rev. Jos. R., Nashville, Tenn. Moonshiner.

He operated a "wild cat" still while preaching at three different churches nearby.

Smith, Rev. Marshall G., Big Flats, N. Y. Evangelist. Statutory offense.

The woman confessed her misconduct with the minister, who was arrested on complaint of the husband. Tried at Elmira, he pleaded guilty and paid a fine of $25.

Smith, Rev. Simon, Purvis, Miss. Eloped with sister-in-law; arrested and jailed.

Snyder, Rev. J. Edw., Baltimore, Md. Defendant in divorce suit.

Sorenson, Rev. Adrian B., Battle Creek, Mich. Murderous assault.

As the result of a dispute over business matters, the Rev. Sorenson attacked his business associate, J. R. Counterman, with the expressed intention of killing him. The pastor went to jail.

Sprague, Rev. James A., Kokomo, Ind. Methodist. Misconduct with a public school teacher; resigned and departed.

He was a very popular preacher, but although he had a wife and daughter he could not let the women alone, and this, apparently, was not the first sign of his weakness.

Stanley, Rev. B. S., Detroit, Mich. Baptist. Wife and child abandonment.

When the Rev. Stanley left town, it was discovered that his young woman stenographer was also among the missing.

Stanley, Rev. J. V., Bonners Ferry, Idaho. Methodist. Statutory charge.

The girl confessed, it is alleged, to Mrs. Stanley, and said the preacher told her the act was not wrong.

Steinberg, Rev. Dr. Bernhard, New York. Lutheran. Cruelty to wife.

She says that he kicked her shins and called her names; he counters with the assertion that she is frigid.

Stiles, Rev. Leon V. Dead beat and flim-flam artist.

Wanted in The Dalles, Oregon, on a charge of passing worthless drafts. The Pinkerton men who made the arrest say he has list of crimes charged against him that would cover considerable paper.

Still, Rev. W. C., New Boston, Ark. Evangelist. Criminal conduct with twelve-year-old girl; given twenty years in prison.

The complaint was made by the girl's father, who had assisted the Rev. Still in his missionary work. The girl had also helped to make his meeting a success by her singing.

Stough, Rev. Henry W., Wilkes-Barre. Evangelist. Sued for slander.

Several councilmen brought suit against the Rev. Stough for $50,000 damages as the result of some loose talk the preacher indulged in.

Strauss, Rev. S. J., Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Evangelist. Trespass.

The newspapers say that three $5,000 trespass suits are brought against the evangelist by Hazleton men.

Sutton, Rev. E. B., Seattle, Wash. Presbyterian. Election fraud.

Swackard, Rev. G. C., Savannah, Ga. Statutory offense against a young woman; convicted.

Sweeney, Rev. M. M., Pittsburgh, Pa. Catholic. Sued for divorce.

In 1914, the Rev. Sweeney while pastor of St. James Roman Catholic church married Christina Moran, who now seeks to divorce him.

Szczygrel, Rev. Ludwig, Pittsburgh, Pa. Catholic. Murder; convicted on first count; will plead guilty on second.

This priest with the unpronounceable name murdered two brothers.

Taylor, Rev. J. Murray, Saginaw, Mich. Church of Christ. Assault.

The warrant for the arrest of the Rev. J. Murray Taylor charged him with having assaulted a Mrs. Mary C. Eastman while visiting her home.

Taylor, Rev. Wm. H., Kansas City, Mo. Baptist. Sued for slander by a woman.

The Rev. Taylor answers the suit of Miss Hudson by declaring that "he had considered it his duty to investigate what had been told him and that any statements of others, which he may have repeated, were privileged communications, because of his right to look into affairs of his church members."

Taylor, Rev. J. L., Basin, Wyo. Baptist. Attempted rape.

Arrested and held under $1,000 bail on charge of attempted assault on Edna Barnett, aged sixteen. When accused by her two brothers of the crime he is said to have appeared with a knife in his hand, reinforced by his son with a brickbat.

Thoburn, Bishop James M., Syracuse, N. Y. Methodist. Libel.

The jury in the case of Dr. Salein A. Hopkins against Bishop Thoburn for libel returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500.

Thomson, Rev. Geo. W., Woodbury, N. J. Presbyterian. Suicide.

Engaged to wealthy widow, his suicide followed threat made against him by another woman, a member of his congregation.

Thomas, Rev. C. H., Madison, Wis. Methodist.

Arrested on the charge of brutally assaulting a colored woman.

Thomazin, Rev. Ignatius, Albany, Minn. Roman Catholic.

Committed suicide by jumping from the sixth story of the Sherman House, Chicago, Ill. Resigned from St. Anthony's church, Albany, after receiving a severe beating from three parishioners.

Thompson, Rev. J. V., Granite Falls, Wash. Evangelical. Street fighting with another preacher in Everett; arrested.

Toleen, Rev. Frank P., Chicago, Ill. Baptist. Disorderly conduct.

When arrested as he was about to enter a hotel with a young woman who described herself as an actress, the Rev. Toleen indignantly exclaimed: "I am merely studying the moral conditions of Chicago, gathering material for a sermon. I am making a sociological study of your great city." The policeman informed him that he might tell it to Judge Martin in the night court, who had a reputation as a sociologist. The clergyman was fined five dollars and costs. Thus do the worldly misjudge the righteous.

Tomkins, Rev. Geo., Boston, Mass. Christian Scientist. Sued for divorce.

In her suit for divorce, Mrs. Tomkins said the minister had broken into her apartments and had beaten and kicked her. The divorce was granted.

Toms, Rev. F. E., Larned, Kan. Baptist. Bigamy.

The charge against him is brought by a local Baptist minister, Rev. F. W. Gorkin.

Trachinsky, Rev. John, New York. Greek Catholic. Bigamy; arrested.

Having already a wife in Passaic, N. J., it is alleged that he married another in New York and absconded with her $500.

Triplett, Rev. John Edwin, New Haven, Conn. Presbyterian. Conspiracy.

He was accused of having entered into a conspiracy with his brother to lure his (the parson's) wife to a hotel, place her in a compromising position and thereby get the evidence on which to base an action for divorce. Hampton Triplett is on trial for attempted criminal assault on Mrs. John Edwin Triplett.

Trout, Rev. I. B., Lanark, Ill. United Brethren. Improper conduct.

Attracted to the "White Light" section of Chicago because of the many opportunities it afforded of studying sociological conditions at close range, the Rev. Trout of Lanark, Ill., became well known to head waiters and various sophisticated gentry of Chicago's night life. They named him "the goat." His guide, counsellor and friend on the research expeditions was a Miss Florence Maxwell, one of the bright stars of the South Side Cabaret Belt. The clergyman says he intended to reform her, whereat the girl threatens to sue him for defamation of character. Some letters written to Miss Maxwell by the parson, who is verging on the "slipped pantaloons" stage, are reprinted in the newspapers and would no doubt make lively reading matter had they not suffered so by the editors' elisions. They are as plentifully sprinkled with asterisks as are dispatches passing through the war censor's hands.

Tucker, Rev. Wm. Alfred, Miami, Fla. Episcopal. Murderer and suicide.

Facing prosecution by the Federal authorities for mailing obscene matter, the Rev. Tucker shot and killed himself after killing his companion in sin, Harriett Delaney.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. 2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

THE MORAL SENSE.

From J. L. Mahoney, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In "The Mysterious Stranger," a posthumous novel by Mark Twain, the leading character (Satan) appears without the moral sense, and consequently can do no wrong. He says, in effect, "that the human race, by having the power to choose between right and wrong, in nine times out of ten chooses the wrong."

The "moral sense" is that mysterious, fathomless thing, whose function is to distinguish between right and wrong. After the distinction is made, the mind is left to freely choose. It appears that the inner power which causes us to choose and act is either hope of reward or fear of punishment. Also that without the moral sense we could do no wrong, because we wouldn't know what wrong was. Right and wrong would be meaningless words. Where did this moral sense originate? I think it is the invention of priests with the cooperation of kings and high-class rulers. The aforementioned are the only benefactors, in the sense that they conferred a benefit upon themselves. They have always claimed immunity from wrongdoing. The biblical view of the moral sense dates back to the Garden of Eden. It came spontaneously with the eating of the forbidden fruit, thereby making our so-called first parents accessories before the fact of every subsequent moral crime or wrong choosing. Why isn't it logical to assume that Adam and Eve have been made the "goats" by a clever construction placed on that tragical event?

"The serpent said to Eve, 'For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as the gods, knowing good and evil.'" Gen. iii, 5.

It is axiomatic that if Eve did not know right from wrong before eating the forbidden fruit, she could not have committed a wrong by eating it.

An evil state of mind is not a legal crime. It may become one by putting it into practice, but it is a religious crime, or sin, as the ecclesiastics call it. The church confessional is entirely dependent upon "it"—the moral sense—no matter how good a subject appears on the surface; when malice, jealousy and envy are at work in the heart, they will always choose the wrong on the theory that it will reward or satisfy their evil appetite. For as Satan says: "To decide wrongly is human; rightly is inhuman." The mind is the incubator where all vices are hatched. Because a self-called good person (religious) has the power to choose between good and evil in life's petty things, he will choose the evil and think himself safe—ostrich policy. Remove the moral sense from the average religionist, and the rest of us might unconsciously get a square deal once in a while.

MR. SEVERANCE AND THE WAR.

From A. Young, British Columbia.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Mr. Channing Severance, in THE TRUTH SEEKER Dec. 23, gives us quite a lengthy article on the peace at any price, stop the war cry, from a strong pro-German point of view. He infers that had the United States not furnished munitions the war would have stopped long ago. What can he know about that? The French with the help of a small British and Belgian force stopped the German army from entering Paris and drove them back a considerable distance and held them there before munitions to any extent could have arrived in France from the United States. Of course had no munitions come to France from the United States it is quite likely that more Frenchmen with the Allies would have had to die, for it is not very likely that the French, British and Russians would have laid down their arms without a very severe struggle. But on the other hand, perhaps more of these finely educated Germans, Austrians and Turks, whose life value is worth so much more than other people's lives, would still be living. Again, if the Germans had conquered Europe in short order, is it not quite likely they would have come over to the American continent as well, to try conclusions here? Mr. Severance is very unfortunate in using Thomas Paine's name in his stop the war cry. Thomas Paine was a soldier and fought in the ranks. If he were in France at the present moment, would he lie down to the kaiser more willingly than he did to King George? I think not. The time for the United States as a great neutral to have interfered, if at all, was before Serbia was invaded. The Servians did not wish to fight, nor did Belgium. They would have been glad to remain neutral (my guess). As for ending all war, how can it be done so long as there is exploitation by human beings against human beings? Exploitation of each other is war in itself, and the most degrading; when we are not cutting each other's throats, we are kept busy stealing each other's bread—even the children's bread is not exempt. There is no such thing as mutual aid in this capitalist system; all is strife, strike and war. Yours for a better system.

BIBLE CIVILIZATION.

An Open Letter to Rev. Dr. Pedley, Canada.

From Norman Murray, Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In answer to some recent statements of yours regarding the Bible, I venture to address to you the following Open Letter, in the hope that some of those persons who heard your discourse may have an opportunity to read something on the other side of the question.

As you are one of the few clergymen in Montreal whose utterances I take any interest in, I went to hear you speak on "Popular Mistakes About the Bible," on Dec. 7 last. I thought some of your remarks were worth making a note of, and considered at one of my Sunday afternoon lectures. For yourself personally, I have the greatest respect, as I have for all good people of whatever denomination who can differ so much in opinion on religious questions as you and I, and still can meet each other as friends. One of the mysteries of life to me is how any intelligent, well-informed person in this so-called enlightened age can hold the opinion I had myself at one time, and you and many other intelligent, well-meaning people seem to hold still, about that collection of old Hebrew fables and folklore called the Bible.

Let me make a few comments on some of the points you tried to make. You talked about misunderstandings regarding the Bible. There would be no misunderstandings as far as I and a good many others are concerned, if a great part of the Bible was put in the same class as Baron Munchausen, Gulliver's Travels, Arabian Nights, Robinson Crusoe, or even the Pilgrim's Progress. A great deal of it is as imaginary as any of the effusions of the authors just mentioned. You say it is a book for all people; I say it is a crime against humanity to circulate it indiscriminately as God's Holy Word among the ignorant masses. You say it is never obscure; yet I can easily show in a very short time that it is full of contradictions and Oriental parables that western people never understood, and never will. Christ himself is said to have spoken in parables, so that all the people might not understand him.

If it is a plain book, why are there so many commentaries written to explain it? Or why have there been so many different sects in ancient and modern times, on account of the uncertainty of the teachings of that book?

Then you say the Bible made the German nation the great nation it is. The fact of the matter is, that the German thirty years' war of religion (1618 to 1648) put Germany back out of its natural place in Europe for over 200 years. When Luther started his Reformation, Germany was the leading nation in Europe, but the curse came with the Reformation. Germany was reduced by mutual extermination of Catholics and Protestants from thirty millions to twelve millions in thirty years. They do not teach this very interesting chapter in Protestant schools in Europe and America when they are teaching the Bible lesson about the history of the Reformation, or the life of William of Orange of so-called glorious and immortal memory.

Germany commenced to get on her feet as she commenced to discard the Bible, and the same is true of France. It is hard to say which of these two countries cares least for the Bible now, France or Germany. Let me draw your attention to a very popular classical historian, Tacitus. In his interesting sketch of the ancient Germans he makes statements which are very interesting to all believers in the higher forms of morality. Divorce, prostitution and polygamy—such hateful characteristics of many people in this so-called civilized age—were absolutely unknown among those ancient people with whom we are so closely related in blood and commerce. Prostitution and various other forms of vice came to northern Europe with the spread of Jewish superstition.

Even under the regime of the Roman Catholic church before the Reformation, it is a fact known to all students of history that the morals of the people of the northern countries of Europe were of a much higher type before the introduction of Christianity than they have been since, and that the standard of morality shortly after the Reformation was much lower than it was before the Reformation.

The strange presumption of giving credit for anything that is good in our modern civilization, to the Bible and Christianity, is absolutely absurd. The movement that started Europe on her feet again in these lines at the period that is commonly called the Reformation period was the revival of pagan art, philosophy, history and science. To them we owe, to a large extent, the better system of housing, railroads and other roads, manufacturing, printing and various other discoveries useful to man.

We absolutely owe nothing to the Hebrews or Christians but trouble and worry all along the line. All that is good in the Bible, or Christianity, is what agrees with pagan thought; where it differs from pagan thought it is frequently inferior. Then you talk about the good the Bible did for Scotland. The introduction of the Bible in Scotland was the greatest curse that ever came in that country. The only part of what is called Scotland that I am particularly interested in, the Highlands, is now a desert. In the island of Lewis, where I was born sixty years ago, the masses of the people lived and do still live in mud houses. The walls are made of mud, or earth and stone, the floors are of mud, the roofs are thatched with straw, there are no chimneys; the peat fire is in the middle of the floor, the smoke finds its way out through the straw. That straw when it gets well saturated with soot is taken off and used as manure to help make the potatoes grow. Fresh straw is again put on when the next barley crop is taken in. This is the kind of dwelling in which I was born and brought up, and learned my early lessons in the long winter nights.

Sixty years ago the old people practically knew nothing about the Bible, for the very good reason that they could not read, and the preachers picked out the best parts of the Bible for their benefit, as the Roman Catholic clergy still do in places where the people cannot read. Many of the old people then living were absolute pagans that have never accepted Christianity at all. Though the people were poor and ignorant, they were of a good type, kind and charitable and good living. There was only one church in each parish that the people went to. After a while everybody started to read the Bible, and the natural consequence followed. The young folks got a great deal of amusement in school and church by picking out obscene passages from the Bible. Then the religious people started arguing and quarreling about the different kinds of churches. They neglected their sheep and cattle and their crops and other industries, and devoted much of their time to foolish discussions about religious questions about which they knew nothing, and the Island of Lewis today, with sixty years of Bible study and earnest religious teaching, is worse off morally, intellectually and in every other way than it was sixty years ago.

The Highland and other Scotch people that come to Montreal cannot be worked up to take any enthusiastic interest in the state of the country they left behind them, as the Roman Catholic Irish take in their country. Then take our own country. Montreal with all its shortcomings is a much better place to live in than Toronto. Catholic Quebec, at least the rural part of it, is much more moral than any district of its size in the Protestant portion and the United States to the south of us. There are more divorces and wife desertions to the thousand in the United States in one year than in French Quebec since the time of Jacques Cartier. According to the pragmatic philosophy, the proof of the pudding is the eating of it. We have a great deal more liberty in Montreal than they have in Toronto. The overbearing intolerance of the Protestants, particularly the Irish in Ontario and Manitoba, is a disgrace to any civilization. I never could see how the Protestants, who claim liberty for themselves, got the idea that after they got liberty for themselves, then they should start to tyrannize over others in school and church matters.

In the first chapter of Genesis man is described as being created in the image of God. Naturally it would follow, if man is the image of God, God is the image of man. Do you believe this foolish idea that the supreme creator of the universe is a great big man with a big, long beard like the Jewish patriarch? In Gen. viii, we are told that he was so pleased with the smell of the roast beef that Noah offered as a sacrifice after the flood, that he promised not to get so angry with the world any more so as to destroy them all with water as he did before. Do you believe in that kind of a God yourself? If not, why don't you head a movement to get up a better text-book of ethics than that old Hebrew collection of Hebrew fables? You know the story of Cain and Abel: Cain brought the fruit of the ground to the priest, and Abel brought mutton; therefore he was received and Cain was rejected. Do you really believe that God is angry with me because I bring neither potatoes, cabbage nor money to priests of any kind? Let me tell you truthfully, that I don't pray any more, and that I don't give two straws for all the prayers of all the clergy of all denominations of the universe.

WORDS AND PHRASES.

From W. C. Tremier, Pennsylvania.
To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

When words are phrased in understandable terms they might very aptly be termed the "visible portrayers of invisible desires," and will, under given psychic conditions, produce such psychic effects as the portrayal of same desires.

Human conceptions are based upon truth, or error, or upon a combination of these two qualities, and when expressed in cognizable verbal terms will produce psychic effects that are socially helpful or hurtful in exact proportion to the ethical quality of the concept that gave them birth.

It may truthfully be stated that "doubt is the beginning of wisdom," and this because doubt induces inquiry, and this latter when intelligently pursued broadens the scope of human perspective and enables man to obtain a clearer concept of that quality called Truth.

During the recent political campaign adroitly sketched word pictures of America's economic ills, and the quality of men and methods needed to remove same, exerted a nation-wide psychic influence regarding aforesaid social questions, and in all probability were a determining factor in the election of those men who will guide "The Ship of State" for the next four years.

The psychic effects produced by said verbal portraiture were, however, farther reaching than the election of men to public office, as said effects will find their visible expression in the social and economic activities of the nation as a whole and only the passage of time will disclose the nature and extent of said psychical influence.

During the aforesaid campaign thousands of mentalities were psychically affected by skillfully though more or less ambiguously sketched word pictures of "Pacifists at any price," "Hyphenated Americans," "Mollycoddles," "Halfbacked Sentimentalists," and other equally nondescript units of the body social, and said portraiture had much to do in molding public sentiment favorably toward the kind of military preparedness indulged in by those European nations that are now so busily engaged in destroying each other.

For many centuries gods and devils, infernos and paradises have been psychically imprinted upon the minds of countless thousands of this earth's inhabitants, and these invisible conceptions have been introspectively viewed with such credulous seriousness by their possessors that they were not only willing but in myriads of instances actually have resorted to the most cruel methods of each particular day or age to compel all those who failed to see and subscribe to said concepts, to so see and subscribe.

The psychic effects produced by many of the verbal delineations dealing with both the here and the hereafter have so beclouded human mentality that even those nations that call themselves civilized are devoting more wealth and more efforts in the destruction of life and human happiness than in the conservation of same, and are calling upon a supposed omniscient creator to sanction said activities.

In closing I wish to submit as my personal conviction the opinion that the mental stimuli afforded by the disappointments mankind will from time to time meet in placing undue reliance upon verbal delineations which are based upon fiction rather than upon fact, will eventually provoke sufficient doubt to usher in concepts that will make men rational and, therefore, truly civilized.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Marie Jeannie Roland, Jan. 17, 1754—Nov. 9, 1793.

Marie Jeannie Philpon, known no less by her life than by her sad, tragic death upon the guillotine, is one of the greatest woman characters of history. Even gruff, unsympathetic old Thomas Carlyle spoke of her as the "creature of Simplicity and Nature, in an age of Artificiality, Pollution and Cant." She was born Jan. 17, 1754, and was married to M. Roland in 1780. She was born at a stirring period of French history. Voltaire had established himself in Geneva, where, as Ingersoll said, "he pointed the finger of scorn at every hypocrite in Europe." Rousseau had published his "Discourse on Inequality," and the great French Encyclopedia, which caused such a revolution of thought, had begun to make its appearance. Those who are the strongest and most active Freethinkers, strange as it might appear, have been the most pious in their youth. So it was with Madame Roland. As a young girl she astonished the priests by her knowledge of theology. She received her education in a convent, where her first communion seemed to her "a guarantee of eternal felicity," as it is to every Roman Catholic. To one who is a reader and a thinker, with an open mind, this mental condition cannot continue. While in the convent Marie kept in mind the names of the skeptics attacked by the priests, and when she came out obtained their works and read them, with the result that by the year 1777 she was an avowed Agnostic. Her letters explaining her change of opinion make most interesting reading. The struggle between the religious emotions implanted in her mind while a child, with the reason of a mature woman, was terrible, but her reason triumphed. Her sentiments were the sentiments of Montaigne:

"In spite of all that is preached to the contrary, it should always be remembered that it is man who gives, and man who receives that it is a mortal hand that offers and a mortal hand that accepts."

The French Revolution came, and in 1793 the "Reign of Terror." Madame Roland identified herself with the Girondists, as did Danton, Paine, and the great body of Freethinkers. This was the humane party of the period. Ministers and most Christian writers leave the impression that there was but one party, all Infidels, who were responsible for the Reign of Terror. They also falsely assert that the Christian religion was abolished in France. The Jacobins, the party of cruelty, were led by Robespierre, a Roman Catholic. When this party came into power,

Madame Roland, with other Girondists, was arrested. A prominent lawyer, M. Chauveau-Lagarde, volunteered to defend her. She refused his services, saying: "You would lose your life without saving mine. I know my doom. Tomorrow I cease to exist." Of her fortitude in prison, Count Beugnot, a fellow prisoner, who at first was unfavorably inclined toward her, says: "We were kept awake each night by the cries of the wretched reviling each other. The room occupied by Madame Roland became the asylum of peace and safety in the midst of this inferno. When she went into court her presence brought good order there, and those women, over whom all power had been exercised in vain, were controlled through the fear of displeasing her." On Nov. 9 she was led to the scaffold with a fellow prisoner named Lamarche. She was to be executed first, but she renounced this right, not wanting to give her companion the pain of seeing her blood shed. He protested, but she gaily said: "Will you refuse a lady her last request?" when he yielded. To again quote Carlyle: "She had as brave a heart as ever beat in a woman. Like a white Grecian statue, serenely complete, she shines in that black wreck of things."

The Scout Movement As a Moral Organization.

The religion of boys is something which their elders like to think they possess, but which they do not possess. These worthy people mistake acquiescence for that deep-rooted conviction which is not possible to the youthful mind. It would seem far easier to teach boys morality upon practical lines: the necessity of being temperate, honest, and truthful can surely be better explained upon the basis of human experience than upon the assumption of an angry God. As a matter of fact, the church neglects the teaching of morality to-day as it has done in the past. The great thing, from the ecclesiastical point of view, is to believe certain dogmas—the creeds, the catechism, and the Lord's Prayer contain far more dogma than morality, and these children are taught carefull to repeat, without any understanding of them at all. The Ten Commandments seem to forbid new things that a child would be tempted to do; he is not likely to make any graven image and fall down and worship it, neither is there much chance of him coveting his neighbour's ox, ass, or wife.

One of the best forms of practical moral teaching is to be found in the Scout movement. In this organization boys are taught to be loyal, truthful, obedient, kind, thrifty, and clean; and they are taught on general lines to think and act for themselves, both in their own best interests and in those of other people. Definite teaching on the subject of personal hygiene is also given to them, and their powers of observation and reasoning receive definite development in all properly conducted Scout troops. It is significant that the church has "grabbed" at the Scout-movement. It recognized in that movement a means of getting hold of boys whom, in all other respects, it had failed to attract; and probably many clergy realize in themselves, though they would never admit it, that Scout-craft is more likely to make good citizens out of a number of boys than the dogmas and platitudes of church-made "Christianity."

Fortunately, the Boys Scout Association refuses to ally itself with the church or any other religious body. It may be interesting to note that when the Scouts were first started the church said: "Here is a good thing, so let us copy it, and have a scout organization of our own." This organization was duly formed, but there were too many clerical "kinks" in it. The Scout Association proper refused to recognize it, and now it has ceased to exist. The Church Lads' Brigade is gradually sharing the same fate, owing to the development of the Scout movement.

On a perusal of Sir Robert Baden-Powell's handbook, Scouting for Boys, it will be found to be conceived on the broadest lines. Sir Robert is presumably a Christian, but his Christianity is so liberal and all-embracing that no one but the narrowest-minded person could possibly object to it. His great purpose is to build up the boys' character, and he relies entirely upon human and earthly means in so doing. The Scout movement is also non-military, non-political, and non-class, as well as being strictly undenominational and non-sectarian. It may therefore be strongly commended to Rationalists who like boys and wish to help them.—J. Moore Bailey in the Literary Guide (London).

Why Ripe Apples and Bananas Are Sweet.

The government laboratories at Washington have recently been trying to ascertain why sweet potatoes are sweet and what constitutes a really ripe banana. This is not merely a matter of curiosity on the part of the official chemists, but is of practical importance in these days of cold storage.

The season of unripe apples and little boys' tummyaches will soon be upon us, and we might as well know why the one is so likely to cause the other. It is in apples, as in bananas and sweet potatoes, a matter of starch and sugar. "The unripe apple," says the Journal of the American Medical Association, "is relatively rich in starch and poor in sugars." As the ripening goes on the starch gradually changes into sugar. As starch it is indigestible. Before being digested all starch has to be changed into sugar. This process is performed in the human body by the chemical action of digestive juices, especially the saliva.

The process takes place in the fruit itself while ripening. And, strange to say, the ripening is independent of all connection with the plant on which the fruit is borne. This is well known to every gardener who plucks tomatoes or other fruits and places them to ripen in the sun, and to every importer of bananas who gets them green, places them in storage and watches them turn yellow.

Some apples are ripe when picked in October, others (called "winter varieties") have to be kept for several months. Different species vary widely in the time they take to turn their starch into sugar.

With bananas the conversion is most rapid while they are turning from green to yellow. During this time the fruit "breathes" rapidly, giving off large quantities of carbon dioxide. The peel is giving up its water and the pulp is absorbing it. The banana is ripe when the process of change from insoluble starch to soluble sugar has ceased.

The same process takes place in the sweet potato. During growth the vines deposit scarcely anything but starch in the tubers. Immediately after these are harvested the transformation into sugar begins, and it is quite rapid. "There is a gradual disappearance of starch during the months from October to March, and probably a reformation of starch, accompanied by a disappearance of cane sugar, during the latter part of the season (March to June)."

In cold storage the change is rapid, but "the sweet potatoes invariably rot by the action of fungi before the changes have reached their maximum."—North American Review.

THE INQUISITION BOOK.

"A Short History of the Inquisition," compiled in THE TRUTH SEEKER office and published by the Truth Seeker Company, has had a wide distribution for a two-dollar Freethought book; and it is with a reasonable expectation of new orders for it that we have again placed it on the press, to be ready in January. The work has been read not only with praise, but even with gratitude to its publishers. It deals with Protestant as well as Catholic persecutions, witchcraft, slavery, etc., and we believe gives the best description of that brutal engine of cruelty and graft, the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, that is to be obtained anywhere without searching libraries. It is filled with rare and effective pictures.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

THE SERVICE OF MAN

By JAMES COTTER MORISON

This is a book of peculiar interest, written by a man of striking personality. The object of the book is to show how the Service of God, or of Gods, leads by natural evolution to the Service of Man; from Theolatriy to Anthropolatriy. Mention of some of the chapter headings will show the attractive nature of the work. Chapter II deals with "The Decay of Belief"; Chapter IV with "The Alleged Consolations of the Christian Religion"; Chapter VI is named "Morality in the Ages of Faith"; and in the VIIIth chapter there is recorded "What Christianity Has Done." There are in all nine chapters of clear and accurate reasoning in favor of the glorification of man over a decadent laudation of gods. The book is framed in an admirable spirit, and exhibits on every page the generous nature and lively vivacity of its author. It is invaluable to the student of Rationalism, especially if he be called upon to "give a reason for the faith that is in him."

The Hell of Ignorance.

We talk about the future state—
If there is life beyond the grave;
If heaven or hell shall be our fate;
Christ crucified our souls to save.

The theme is old, yet ever new;
For ages argued pro and con.
None has returned to give his view
Of hell or heaven—no not one.

So why torment our mortal life
In building hell and hope for heav'n,
With all the chances in the strife
That to the fiend our souls be given.

The only heaven I demand
Is to be loved and love in turn.
My angels are a wingless band;
Their happiness my chief concern.

The only hell that frightens me
Is ignorance—a mental blind.
A devil surely must he be
Who strives not to improve his mind.

To reason's throne I bend my knee,
To men of science give my praise,
And ever pray that man will be Released some day from mental haze.

Let me go where'er I will
I hear a sky-born music still;
It is not only in the rose,
It is not only in the bird,
But in the darkest, meanest things
There always, always something sings.

The Middle Ages Revisited

Or the Roman Government and Religion from Augustus to the Fall of Constantinople.

BY ALEXANDER DEL MAR,
Formerly Director of the U. S. Bureau of Commerce, Navigation and Statistics.

A learned and thoughtful volume from America which takes a minute survey of the institutes of Roman government and religion, with the view of ascertaining in how far these have affected modern civilizations in general, and that of Britain in particular. That the lawful supremacy of the Sacred Empire is the guide to all modern history the writer supports with a great array of well-ordered learning, and with a suggestiveness that cannot but prove stimulating and valuable to all classes of historical students. The book will interest and instruct every serious student who wishes to understand the unity of the older age with the new, and to retrace the true course of the line along which the civil and religious institutions of the present time have had their development.—Edinburgh Scotsman.

Every student knows that the medieval chroniclers romanced to a degree that renders their statements untrustworthy. Here we have the historical method with its remorseless sifting.—London Athenaeum.

Mr. Del Mar, who is one of the most profound of living students of the early history of Britain, brings to his researches, concerning the middle ages, a vast store of knowledge. There can be no gainsaying the formidable array of evidence he brings to bear upon his conclusions. This is, undoubtedly, a book of striking importance.—Liverpool Mercury.

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

The Influence of the Church on Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Another View of Woman.

Mary Monico need not "admit" that "the environment of the contemporary stage is not conducive to the development of psychological acumen." No one has made such a statement. It originates with Mary Monico. Why "admit" what she only thinks? This statement betrays an utter lack of knowledge on Mary Monico's part, of the stage, its people, environment and psychological aura. It is always safest to leave untouched a subject of which we know nothing.

I need not the ability of a Meredith or a Hardy to "compute in definite terms and quantities" the influence a wife has on the husband, or the husband on the wife. Anyone at all honest with herself or himself will concede this. Most of this is accomplished by the so-called subconscious mind, or, as our friends the jokers have it, the unconscious mind. When influence is wrought with full knowledge and forethought it is hypnotism, pure and simple, or when put into words—"bringing up." "John, I wish you would not do this"—"Bill, why will you do so-and-so when you know how it irritates me?" et cetera ad nauseam, is not wielding influence—it is trying to make a man over to suit ourselves, or a woman, as the case may be. Influence subconsciously conveyed betokens no virtue on the part of the conveyor. And trying to live a good or even an exemplary life to influence one's partner does not often work out properly. See the many wives who are slovenly and have the neatest kind of husbands. Again see the many wives, who are really decent, possess many virtues, and have wretched male things for wedded partners.

And so pregnancy will prohibit a woman sitting in Congress? Need I mention that with the proper dissemination of knowledge on birth-control, pregnancy can be regulated so as not to interfere? Why go to the extreme of a "majority of pregnant women" in Congress? Granted that women are, during this period, hysterical and inconsistent, has anyone ever heard our congressmen and senators accused of being consistent and logical? If so, it has not reached my ears. And if a woman does become pregnant, could she not obtain a leave of absence in a proper manner instead of the way our males do now—simply stay away, getting their salaries right along while they are at home pursuing their private affairs? I grant you that the mind of an anemic girl, whose periods of menstruation are irregular, is not as sound and logical as the mind of the average boy. Neither is the mind of the average office holder of today, with his pockets ever open for what lucre someone wishes to drop into it, with his carousals and "what-the-h—do-I-care-for-the-voter" attitude, as logical as the mind of his wife at home, pregnant though she may be. And if you think I do not know of what I speak when I say "carousals," then visit any capital of any state and find for yourself that there are hotels which at stated times will reserve an entire floor for senators and congressmen who "make a night," and sometimes several nights of it. While passing through Washington, D. C., a little while ago, scandal had the story about town that some of the office buildings there, the Federal office buildings, mind you, had been raided a few weeks back, because of the gambling and other sports going on there. Does the man's supposed superior logic keep him decent? Isn't the gambling instinct a form of hysteria of the worst possible sort?

Yes, self-interest does dominate the land, which is proven by the fact that the person or persons with the largest amount of cash to spend usually gets what he is after, and look you, we have only men in our houses of parliament today. It is a notorious fact that the party with the largest campaign fund has elected its nominee for President ever since Hector was a pup. And of course the "primitively honest male" must of necessity dance to the tune whistled by the givers to said campaign fund. Wives and babies and all that other sentimental bosh are thrown to the winds. "My political obligations" must be attended to.

Of course, women who have no sex life are incomplete. But continence does not usually bring with it the feeble mind and body that overindulgence does. Ask your physician. But why the extremes? Must we at once throw out of office all the men, and place in their stead all pregnant women, or continent women? During the period referred to as "change of life," a woman does need repose and shelter. But does she get it? It makes one laugh to read of irregular menstruation; a life of continence; pregnancy; change of life: all through this, in fact, all through life a woman is simply a useless thing. She needs special care, rest, ease. Again I ask, does she get it? Is it not a fact that women work harder all through life than men do, and live longer? Is it not also true that with a proper healthy life, made easier by laws passed for women by women, they will attain a healthier state, if that is the greatest plaint? Did not our mothers and grandmothers, who did not work in factories and stores as we do today, possess a greater abundance of vitality than we do? Were menstruation, pregnancy, child-bearing, change of life to them the great bugbear that they are to us to-day? All of these things are very hard on the woman of today because of man's great yearning for the almighty dollar, and toward the amassing of which women's and children's lives are ground out, until there are few of us today who can live year in and out without going to pieces some time. And just because it takes a woman to understand how women can and do suffer at certain times, it will take women to so amend or wipe out our laws that living will be a bit more worth while. Look you, a woman's body even is not her own. She shall have no say as to whether or not she will become a mother, though it is she who will have the worry and work of feeding another mouth when the child comes; it is she who must stretch out the man's salary to cover the food and clothing of another member of the family. Does the husband do any more? You say the husband already works as hard as he can, and can do no more? But I say he can do more. He can make things so that she, the woman, shall have the say as to whether another child shall be brought into existence, and existence only, surely not life; for in this day of hustling for bread and butter, very few of us really live. But are not our lawmakers, the men, opposed to this? Not because—as you might say, I think—they are of the male sex, hate women, want to suppress them, keep them down, and all that sort of balderdash, but because they are men and they do not know what is nearest a woman's heart—that to live is her first desire and her right; because the meek little housewife, who is the ideal of so many, is in reality the greatest menace to civilization. Always she keeps everything from the husband, the many inconveniences, the many annoyances, the many crying needs. "Jim works so hard at the office all the day, I do not want him to be burdened with my troubles when he gets home at night," she says. Because the path has been made too smooth for the male of today, he thinks there is nothing wrong. And now, because at last women have taken it upon themselves to get in and try to help the men see what is wrong with the world, and remedy it, we are all up in arms about it and find all sorts of things to say about the inferior female. Overnight the men are to be thrown out on their heads and a bevy of women will step into their places, collect their huge salaries, do no work, be sick and hysterical most of the time, grant favors, graft, and a few other little things like that. And nothing can change this. If you think anything can, then, according to Mary Monico, you betray your ignorance.

Mary Monico's gloves are still off. Well, so is my hat still in the ring. I still insist that it is a woman's right, as it is a man's, to go after and get, if she can, anything she wants. Of course it is the nation's right to curb anyone if what he or she wants and gets will endanger the coming generations. So let us start with the adulteration of foodstuffs. It is quite difficult to dodge stringent laws, the breaking of which will be a certain way of getting into the penitentiary. So far our men lawmakers have failed dismally in this. Note the rotten candies, canned goods, wines and whiskies on the market. In this town, Lima, Ohio, where I am at the present writing, the water even is so bad that to think of drinking it is nauseating. One draws a glass of it and watches the wrigglers in it. It is a favorite indoor sport. I never saw such large and healthy looking animals in any water before, unless the water was stagnant. Of course water is not manufactured, but it can be filtered. The male mayor, councilmen, etc., are not doing their duty, are they? And I have it on very good authority that not one man in Lima, holding office of any kind, is at present pregnant. Could a pregnant woman do worse? This town has for years had a "shoe fund," so children could go to school properly shod in the winter months. What is wrong with the laws of a land in which parents cannot earn sufficient money to keep their children shod? Would a body of continent or irregularly menstruating women close their eyes to this?

Because a pregnant woman is in the Legislature does not prove that her coming child will be born with a face like a speech any more than that the housewife's coming child will be born with a face like an unemptied garbage can. And if every woman in the law-making bodies of the land (providing we had only women in such bodies) would forego the "inconvenience" of motherhood, they would still be a pitifully small number, and the race would not die out in a few years. There are still hordes of women left who love children, and want them, as many as they think they can reasonably support and educate.

No, Mary Monico, mine is not a slave mind, broadly as you hint it, for you mistake me; I never yet have said that men make slaves of women, etc., etc. My remark upon the subject was that there are minds which cannot conceive of a condition of helpful comradeship between men and women. One must be the ruler, the other the ruled. And such, I still insist, constitutes the slave mind.

Developing female attributes to their highest, and subtly influencing man to fight her cause, has not proved a good measure so far. No one will say that the woman of a few years back was outside of her sphere. Everyone of Mary Monico's mind bewails the loss of the old-fashioned woman. Had she, according to this theory, influenced man to fight her cause, there would now be no reason for woman to try and fight her own battles. Besides, she cannot influence her father and her brothers when she is young, because she menstruates. And when she marries and is pregnant, again she cannot influence her husband, because she is hysterical and inconsistent. Then when change of life comes o'er her she needs rest and ease and shelter, and so her influencing qualities cannot, I think, amount to much more than influenza.

Mary Monico's statement that the vote at present is a sop thrown to the individual whose pocket is being picked, I admit as being in part true. Pockets are being picked by our law-making bodies; but if our pockets must be picked until such a time when there will be no laws and no pockets, I say that women, too, shall have a chance at saying who shall be the ones to pick their pockets; for women's pockets are being picked just as industriously as men's in the present day, and they have no voice in the matter. You might say that more votes will not stop the picking process, and perhaps this is true; but I would rather turn out my pockets to someone I had helped to put in position to do so than to one I had nothing to say about. One has the right then to give him or her a "piece of one's mind," which sometimes brings a little relief.

Yes, this world's being a hell is in a large part due to the stupidity of the average women, and they know it; that is why they are up in arms to change matters a wee bit, female organs notwithstanding.

No, the majority of men are not casting off all their obligations and trying to be Shakespeares; neither are a majority of women trying to be Mary Wollstonecrafts. But I do know scores of men and women who commercialize their capabilities, because they must needs eat. Life, no matter how cheap a variety, is dear to us, and we must live. Given a healthy civilization to live under, they could blossom out in their respective fields. That a male law and order system has not given us this, does not speak well for man rule; and while I have small regard for rulers and law-making bodies of any sort, we must have them for the present; and just as a continent man or a continent woman is not entire, is not healthy, so a law-making body of all one sex is not entire, not healthy.

I do not fear, like the women Mary Monico hints at, that women are being made slaves because they are not being received into the "man's sphere" with open arms; the male sex always was sluggish: it is hard for anything new to force its way into the average male skull; and the sight of a woman where only men have been heretofore, naturally disturbs them—they cannot quite make it out. The poor dears fear their dinners will not be cooked on time, and so they object, not because they really think that a woman cannot do certain things, but because they fear women will be too fast for them, and leave them at the post when the real running starts. Their minds can conceive of no middle course. Running together? No, she must stay at the post or she will leave him there.

The third finger of our hand was smaller at birth, and is that way at our death, but the human child, male and female, is the same, until father and mother start a different set of "don'ts" for the separate sexes. The third finger serves us best assuredly as it is: nature's plan, and a wise one, no doubt. But we use our hands only in the natural things, and you will please notice that the second finger is mighty well lost without the third one for an assistant; and so it is with the third one—it is quite lost without the others to help. And so it must be with woman. Call man the second finger if you will, and woman the shorter third. I maintain that the second finger in trying to maintain a balance by continually shutting out the third finger is going to have his sacred knuckles broken. At present we are living in a man's world, and there must be much of the man about us all to even exist. If that spoils woman, and makes her less feminine, then let the sin, if sin it be, be on the man's head. He did not, in his law-making capacity, create conditions conducive toward keeping woman in the home; and for whatever comes of it, he has himself to thank.

"INGERSOLL AS HE IS."

TRUTH ABOUT THE LIFE, WORK AND CHARACTER OF COL. R. G. INGERSOLL

A refutation of the many baseless and false calumnies, libels, and slanders invented and circulated by the clergy of the United States and elsewhere. The work covers the career of Colonel Ingersoll in WAR, POLITICS, AND PUBLIC AND PRIVATE LIFE.

It disproves the statements contained in the slanders of his clerical vilifiers, and proves that:

1. He was brave in battle.
2. His army record is without a stain.
3. He was a friend of temperance.
4. His private life was above criticism.
5. He was always opposed to slavery.
6. He was one of the most charitable men in the world.
7. No member of his family ever joined the church.
8. He was sincere in his unbelief.
9. He never "advocated the circulation of impure literature."
10. His standing at the bar was high and irreproachable.
11. He was honored by the people of Peoria.
12. He did not "weaken" in his unbelief.

And that in a hundred ways he was exactly the opposite of what he is represented to have been by his preacher critics.

It includes the testimony and tributes of his army comrades and lifelong acquaintances.

The book is the most thorough exposé of clerical mendacity, deceit, unscrupulousness, ignorance, vindictiveness, and incorrigible lying ever published. It will bring the blush of mortification to the cheek of every honest clergyman.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Just a Guess.—An old hen was pecking at some stray carpet tacks in the yard. "Now, what do you suppose that hen is eating those tacks for?" said Henry. "Perhaps," rejoined his little sister, "she is going to lay a carpet."—Literary Digest.

Rule for Success.—The man who had made a huge fortune was speaking a few words to a number of students at a business class. Of course, the main theme of his address was himself.

"All my success in life, all my tremendous financial prestige," he said proudly, "I owe to one thing alone—pluck, pluck, pluck!"

He made an impressive pause here, but the effect was ruined by one student, who asked impressively:

"Yes, sir; but how are we to find the right people to pluck?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

Antiquity Not Appreciated.—An English nobleman was about to set out for India, and, fearing that in his absence vandals might destroy a picturesque ruin on his estate, he said to his steward: "I want you to build a wall here"—he drew a tiny furrow with his stick around the ruin—"a stone wall five feet high."

On his return home the nobleman started for the spot. When he reached it he rubbed his eyes in amazement. There was the new stone wall, but he could see nothing towering up inside of it. He turned excitedly to his steward:

"Look here, where's the ruin, man?" "The ruin, my lord?" replied the steward. "Oh, that ould thing! Sure, I used it to build the wall with."—Boston Transcript.

Modern Girls.—"It is no use trying to get away from the solemn fact that the woman of today is a most practical and resourceful creature," said the man who has known a few.

"What makes you think so?" a friend asked.

"The unsentimental attitude of a girl I know. I told her that she had inspired some of my best poems. She didn't say a word about the poems, but she wrote to my publishers for a percentage of the royalties."—New York Times.

The Art of Life.—Mrs. X—"Bothered with time-wasting callers, are you? Why don't you try my plan?"

Mrs. Y—"What is your plan?"

Mrs. X—"Why, when the bell rings, I put on my hat and gloves before I press the button. If it proves to be some one I don't want to see, I simply say, 'So sorry, but I'm just going out.'"

Mrs. X—"Oh, then I say, 'So fortunate, I've just come in.'"—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

NO PAINE DINNER IN NEW YORK.

President W. M. van der Weyde of the Thomas Paine National Historical Association informs us that there will be no Paine birthday dinner in New York this year. The Paine Association planned to have the dinner at the Café Boulevard, but was informed by the restaurant's manager that Mr. Walker's Sunrise Club dinner was booked for the evening of January 29. The manager was positive and emphatic, the more so when he referred to his calendar and found there confirmation of his assertion. As practically the same people attend the Paine dinner as gather at the Sunrise feasts of soul and reason it was regretfully decided to abandon the idea of the 1917 Paine birthday dinner. When too late to secure speakers, print and mail announcements, etc., it was learned that the restaurant manager was in error, that the Sunrise Club's dinner was actually set for Jan. 22d, not 29th. It is very unfortunate, for we know that the Paine Association prided itself on its long record of well-attended and highly successful dinners in honor of Paine's birthday every January 29th.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizer Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

PAINE'S LESSER WORKS.

Good Material in the Occasional Writings of the Author of the "Age of Reason."

BY W. M. VAN DER WEYDE.

President Thomas Paine National Historical Association.

HAD Thomas Paine written nothing on the subject of religion beyond his "Age of Reason" the thinking world would indeed have had sufficient cause for gratitude. But Paine wrote in addition a number of other essays that are quite as important as is that volume that revolutionized religious thought on both hemispheres.

It is regrettable that of Paine's theological writings only his earliest production, the "Age of Reason," has been widely read. That work, having a very large circulation—the greatest, without doubt, of any work of its character and one of the very largest of any non-fiction work—has been translated into nearly all languages and has been read in every part of the world. But Paine's later writings on theological topics remain practically unknown save to students of the great author and to a small percentage of the world's Free-thinkers; this despite the fact that they are of incalculable consequence and should be known to at least every reader of the "Age of Reason."

Paine's supplementary essays on religion may be found in Moncure Conway's edition of the "Writings of Thomas Paine," vol. iv. They include the "Prospect Papers," "Predestination," "Examination of the Prophecies," "Origin of Freemasonry," "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff," and one or two other papers.

Had it not been for the later religious zeal of Madame Bonneville, to whom Paine in his will left all his "moveable effects," i. e., manuscripts, etc., the world would not only have had many more of Paine's theological and other essays, but would have been also enriched by two volumes of Paine's autobiographic matter, his correspondence with the most eminent men of America, France and England, notes and documents concerning the American Revolution which had been entrusted to him by Franklin for a history of the Revolution which Paine contemplated writing, and many other papers of the utmost historical importance. Best of all, the world would have had Paine's later theological works in whole instead of in fragments. Madame Bonneville, originally a Roman Catholic, had, under Paine's influence, rejected Catholicism, only to revert to it after the death of her benefactor. Very shortly after the great author died Madame Bonneville's zeal for Catholicism was rekindled and she piously mutilated several of the manuscripts on theological subjects that Paine had bequeathed to her. One of the papers in which erasures were made by Madame Bonneville of parts which she considered objectionable was the "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff." Colonel John Fellows, a friend of Paine, rescued several of the fragments and restored the passages that had been erased in the manuscript. Luckily, another portion of this same essay Paine had placed in the keeping of Mrs. Elihu Palmer, who attended the author during his illness in the year 1806. After Paine's death Mrs. Palmer presented that portion of the manuscript to the editor of The Theophilanthropist, who published it in 1880. It had been Paine's original intention to publish the "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff" as Part III of the "Age of Reason."

Madame Bonneville subsequently returned to France and in 1833 came back to America, going to St. Louis to live with her son, General Benjamin Bonneville, who at that time had the Paine manuscripts in his possession. Madame Bonneville died at the General's home and some time later on leaving St. Louis for an indefinite time the papers with some household effects were placed in a storage house for safe keeping. During General Bonneville's absence the storage house was burned down and all the papers not previously recovered from Madame Bonneville accidentally met the same fiery fate as other heretical writings received during the days of the Inquisition.

What has been left to the world of Paine's "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff," although only fragments of the original work, are very important additions to the "Age of Reason."

Paine in his Answer proves very conclusively that the Bishop did not know what he was writing about when in his reply to the "Age of Reason" he asserted that "the oldest book in the world is Genesis."

"This is mere assertion," Paine says; "he offers no proof of it and I go to controvert it, and to show that the book of Job, which is not a Hebrew book, but is a book of the Gentiles translated into Hebrew, is much older than the book of Genesis."

Paine then enters into an acute analysis of that quaint story given in Genesis which is called the fall of man. He says that the story is "no other than a fable borrowed from, and constructed upon, the religious allegory of Zoroaster, or the Persians, of the annual progress of the sun through the twelve signs of the Zodiac. It is the fall of the year, the approach and evil of winter, announced by the ascension of the autumnal constellation of the serpent of the Zodiac, and not the moral fall of man, that is the key of the allegory, and of the fable in Genesis borrowed from it.

"The Fall of Man in Genesis is said to have been produced by eating of a certain fruit, generally taken to be an apple. The fall of the year is the season for the gathering and eating the new apples of that year. The allegory, therefore, holds with respect to the fruit, which it would not have done had it been an early summer fruit. It holds also with respect to place. The tree is said to have been placed in the midst of the garden. But why in the midst of the garden more than in any other place? The solution of the allegory gives the answer to this question, which is that the fall of the year, when apples and other autumnal fruits are ripe, and when days and nights are of equal length, is the mid-season between summer and winter."

Paine's views regarding the Persian origin of that curious fable recited in Genesis, i. e., the astronomical basis of the story, is that commonly accepted nowadays by students of theological origins and by Free-thinkers in general.

Further in his essay Paine says:

"If Genesis be, as the Bishop asserts, the oldest book in the world, and, consequently, the oldest and first written book of the Bible, and if the extraordinary things related in it; such as the creation of the world in six days, the tree of life, and of good and evil, the story of Eve and the talking serpent, the fall of man and his being turned out of Paradise, were facts or even believed by the Jews to be facts, they would be referred to as fundamental matters, and that very frequently, in the books of the Bible that were written by various authors afterwards; whereas there is not a book, chapter, or verse of the Bible, from the time that Moses is said to have written the book of Genesis to the book of Malachi, the last book in the Bible, including a space of more than a thousand years, in which there is any mention made of these things, or any of them, nor are they so much as alluded to. How will the Bishop solve this difficulty, which stands as a circumstantial contradiction to his assertion?"

Paine then explains that "there are but two ways of solving it," one that Genesis is not an ancient book and that it was written by some unknown person about a thousand years after the time Moses is said to have lived, and that, being placed as a preface or introduction to the other books of the collection, none of those other books could mention things told of in the introductory book written long, long after. The other solution, Paine says, is by admitting Genesis to have been written by Moses, and that the Jews did not believe the narration to be true and therefore as they could not refer to the stories of Genesis as facts they would not refer to them as fables. Paine continues: "The first of these solutions goes against the antiquity of the book, and the second against its authenticity; and the Bishop may take which he please."

Paine then proceeds to a very keen examination of Genesis and comes to this conclusion:

"The secret, therefore, explains itself to be that when the Jews were in captivity in Babylon and Persia, they became acquainted with the cosmogony of the Persians, as registered in the Zend-Avesta of Zoroaster, the Persian law-giver, which, after their return from captivity, they manufactured and modeled as their own, and antedated it by giving to it the name of Moses. The case admits of no other explanation.

"From all of which it appears that the book of Genesis instead of being the oldest book in the world, as the Bishop calls it, has been the last written book of the Bible, and the cosmogony it contains has been manufactured."

Another part of the "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff" discusses the names in Genesis, Jewish names, such as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, which curiously were unknown before the Babylonian captivity but have been exceedingly popular among Hebrews ever since. Paine points out that Moses and Aaron, mentioned for the first time in the book of Exodus, have continued to be favorite names among the Jews, but neither of these names is mentioned in the Bible before that time. Says Paine:

"The direct inference from this is that the Jews knew of no such book as Exodus before the Babylonian captivity; in fact, that it did not exist before that time, and that it is only since the book has been invented that the names of Moses and Aaron have been common among the Jews."

The book of Job is also discussed in the "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff." Paine says that Job has not the least appearance of being a book of the Jews, and asserts that although printed among the books of the Bible it does not belong to it. All the internal evidence in the work shows it to be a book of the Gentiles, either of Persia or Chaldea. "The Jews," Paine says, "can give no account how they came by this book, nor who was the author, nor the time when it was written. Paine is convinced, as was Spinoza, that Job was a Gentile."

Paine calls attention to the fact that the name of Job has not been perpetuated by the Jews, as have other favorite Jewish names. What Jew of these days bears the name of Job? I do not know of a single one, but I acknowledge personally knowing two or three Gentiles bearing this grotesque name. Paine says the book of Job bears internal evidence of being the work of some of the Persian Magi. It contains much astronomical allusion which is consonant with the religion of the Persians.

The "Prospect Papers," as they are now generally known, are those essays contributed by Paine during the year 1804 to a monthly magazine published in New York and edited by Elihu Palmer, a famous blind preacher of that period. The magazine was entitled "The Prospect, or Moral View of the World." Palmer was also the author of "Principles of Nature," a work which the British government attempted to suppress at the same time that it prosecuted the publishers of Paine's "Age of Reason," in its endeavors to arrest the circulation of that heretical work. Palmer had been a Presbyterian clergyman but had discarded dogma upon being convinced by the "Age of Reason." He was, according to Dr. Moncure Conway, Paine's most eminent convert. Of the Theistic organization which was established in New York by Paine and Palmer, Dr. Conway, writing some years ago, said: "These two men founded in New York the first purely Theistic Society in Christendom, which survives today in the Freethinking Fraternity, who have their halls in New York and Boston, and preserve the spirit though not the Theism of their founders." That Palmer thought very highly of Paine is attested by these words which he wrote concerning the great author: "Paine was probably the most useful man that ever existed on the face of the earth."

One of the earliest of Paine's contributions to The Prospect was a very informative paper entitled "Remarks on R. Hall's Sermon." In the course of Paine's essay he says:

"The Bible is a history of the times of which it speaks, and history is not revelation. The obscene and vulgar stories in the Bible are as repugnant to our ideas of the purity of a divine Being, as the horrid cruelties and murders it ascribes to him are repugnant to our ideas of his justice. It is the reverence of the Deists for the attributes of the Deity that causes them to reject the Bible."

"Is the account which the Christian church gives of the person called Jesus Christ a fact, or a fable? Is it a fact that he was begotten by the Holy Ghost? The Christians cannot prove it, for the case does not admit of proof. The things called miracles in the Bible, such for instance as raising the dead, admitted if true of ocular demonstration, but the story of the conception of Jesus Christ in the womb is a case beyond miracle, for it did not admit of demonstration. Mary, the reputed mother of Jesus, who must be supposed to know best, never said so herself, and all the evidence of it is that the book of Matthew says that Joseph dreamed an angel told him so. Had an old maid two or three hundred years of age brought forth a child it would have been much better presumptive evidence of a supernatural conception than Matthew's story of Joseph's dream about his young wife.

"Is it a fact that Jesus Christ died for the sins of the world, and how is it proved? If a God he could not die, and if a man he could not redeem. How, then, is this redemption proved to be fact? It is said that Adam ate of the forbidden fruit, commonly called an apple, and thereby subjected himself and all his posterity forever to eternal damnation. This is worse than visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generations. But how was the death of Jesus Christ to affect or alter the case? Did God thirst for blood? If so, would it not have been better to have crucified Adam at once upon the forbidden tree, and made a new man? Would not this have been more creator-like than repairing the old one? Or did God, when he made Adam, supposing the story to be true, exclude himself from the right of making another? or impose on himself the necessity of breeding from the old stock? Priests should first prove facts, and deduce doctrines from them afterwards. Instead of this they assume everything and prove nothing. . . .

"The story of the redemption will not stand examination. That a man should redeem himself from the sin of eating an apple by committing a murder on Jesus Christ, is the strangest system of religion ever set up. . . . The Christian system of religion is an outrage on common sense. Why is man afraid to think?"

"Why do not the Christians, to be consistent, make saints of Judas and Pontius Pilate? For they were the persons who accomplished the act of salvation. The merit of a sacrifice, if there can be any merit in it, was never in the thing sacrificed, but in the persons offering up the sacrifice—and, therefore, Judas and Pontius Pilate ought to stand first on the calendar of saints."

Another of Paine's "Prospect Papers" is a study "Of the word 'Religion' and Other Words of Uncertain Signification." The author shows how meaningless is the word "religion," as commonly used, and how vague and puzzling is the word "Christianity." "The words 'revealed religion' and 'natural religion,'" Paine says, "also require explanation. They are both invented terms, contrived by the church for the support of priestcraft." Other terms used in the Bible are also discussed.

One of the "Prospect Papers" is an analysis of Deism compared to the Christian religion; another discusses the story of Cain and Abel, still another takes up the Tower of Babel. This story, Paine says, is altogether too ridiculous, even as a fable.

There is a very interesting Prospect paper on "the stupid Blue Laws of Connecticut" and the "holy Sabbath day" in that state, also an essay on "The Old and the New Testament," and one entitled "Biblical Anachronism."

The "Examination of the Prophecies" is one of the most important as well as one of the most interesting of those theological writings which Paine published after the "Age of Reason." It is the last work that Paine gave to the press. It was first published in New York, 1807, two years before the famous author's death. The "Examination" was published, with some omissions, in London, four years later, and the publisher, brave old Daniel Isaacs Eaton, was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment and to stand in the pillory in Charing Cross for one hour in each month. As he stood in the barbaric pillory he was jeered and pelted with mud and filth.

The "Examination of the Prophecies" searchingly examines all the biblical accounts of prophecies "about the coming of a person called Jesus Christ." Paine finds that no passage in the Bible prophesies any such thing. The Examination was originally intended to be a part of the "Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff," which was to be published as Part III of the "Age of Reason." Since the prophecies in the Bible are nearly all based on dreams, Paine wrote and published as an introductory chapter to his "Examination of the Prophecies" an "Essay on Dream." This essay is extremely ingenious and plausible and interesting. Paine made a special study of the subject of dreams at a time when the action of the brain in sleep had not previously been scientifically considered, and his deductions of more than a century ago have not been surpassed by even such an eminent modern student of the subject as Freud, the German psychiatrist.

We live in deeds, not years—in thoughts, not breaths—
In feelings, not in figures on a dial;
We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

—P. J. Bailey.

"The Jesus Historical."

Resuming this discussion where it ended last week, let me remind Dr. Wakefield that Jesus came at a time and place where there was a great flux of nations, and where ambitious liars could work on the superstitious masses. I have sought circumstantial data that would give an accurate or close approximation to the time of his existence. If these data have been compiled before, I have never seen them, and shall have to have the evidence before I believe so. From Josephus, I fix the time of John the Baptist. I turn to the Christian legends and find the same unconsciously expressed skeleton that I did in fixing Jesus' creed. I find the followers of John the Baptist persisted as a distinct sect up to the time of Paul. If the gospel narrative of the relation of Jesus to John the Baptist had been true, this persistence of the sect of John would have been impossible. He is said to have saluted Jesus with the words: "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world." Had John believed that and uttered it, he and all his followers would have immediately fused with the following of Jesus. The fact that the record shows they did not is conclusive in itself against the statement. Sundry expressions, however, show that Jesus did not live in the time of John the Baptist. Paul says he "came after him"; and Jesus talks of John as long since dead. "From the days of John the Baptist until now." "They knew him not." "John came neither eating nor drinking." "There has not risen a greater than John the Baptist." This repetition is not accidental. "Thou art John the Baptist." (Referring to the reincarnated John in Jesus.) To make Jesus a possible reincarnation of John is to nullify the whole story of the crucifixion under Pilate. But if we extend his life till after the death of Zacharias, which he is made to refer to, his age becomes what the Jews guessed it to be, viz., between forty and fifty years. Is this a mere coincidence? His familiar reference to the incidents surrounding and anticipating the destruction of Jerusalem is another corroboration. But final, conclusive, and unimpeachable is the direct reference of Josephus himself to a presumably living Jesus called the Christ at the death of his brother James, A. D. 64. This text has not been and cannot be invalidated without destroying the credibility of everything in Josephus. It is in no sense similar to the forgery of Eusebius, and exposes the falsehood of that base attempt to pervert history. By thus bringing Jesus' death nearer to the destruction of Jerusalem we close up an unexplained gap in Christian history, and render intelligible the accusation made against the Jews: "Whom ye slew, and hanged on a tree."

No better evidence can be offered against the claims of Christianity than its own record, and the man who throws that away bodily will be as the voice of one crying in a wilderness.

Mr. Wakefield is indeed laboring when he says I "allude to the creed of Freethinkers." I said: "It is getting to be almost a creed among Freethinkers," etc.

My friend, Mr. Hugh M. Martin, would see the matter precisely as I do but for one obstacle. That obstacle is his reliance on authority. He says "the scholars of the world are practically unanimous in conceding that the passages in Josephus alluding to Jesus are interpolations." Knowing that the scholars of the world have decided this on a false interpretation, and a false basis, I am willing to face the scholars of the world by again demanding their reasons for this unwarranted decision. Beliefs that have long been held as incontestable are frequently reversed by later evidence. In view of the new evidence I produce, I ask for a new trial. There are but two references to Jesus called the Christ in Josephus. One of these is so manifestly a forgery that no scholarship is needed to decide the question. A ten-year-old schoolboy, unbiased by Christian training, could detect it. Because the forgery of Eusebius was thus detected, and there being no evidence whatever of a crucifixion of a Jesus the Christ under Pontius Pilate, Freethinking scholars have been inclined to discredit the second reference, because the Christ born under Herod and crucified under Pilate, with all its gospel additions, is a proved myth. They never thought to analyze the text, and see if it could be otherwise interpreted. I have. I see in it a reference to a living Jesus at the time of the death of his brother James, and not a dead one. If the forgery had not been introduced into the text of Josephus, and there had been no record of a gospel Christ, this would be the universal conclusion of all readers. Try to eliminate the words, "called the Christ," from the text, and you have a Jesus and a James without the remotest means of identification. Nowhere in the whole works of Josephus will you find such a parallel. Cut out James and Jesus from the text, as well as "called the Christ," and you render meaningless the whole chapter, for it all relates to one subject, viz., the causes that brought about the death of James and the consequences that followed it. "Called the Christ" is precisely how Josephus would have referred to it, for he did not believe he was the Christ, as the interpolation makes him to. I have shown in the face of denial, that this reference was there before the days of Origen. The man does not live who can surmise a reason for the forgery of such a text, or chapter, rather, by a Christian.

It is the unguarded statements and admissions of a false witness that have enabled me to prove that the Jesus of the Gospels did not live till long after the death of John the Baptist, and did live up to the death of Zacharias, and feared the impending destruction of Jerusalem. This Jesus is, by their own testimony, proved to be a narrow-minded sectarian Jew who contemplated nothing but the redemption of his own people from bondage. There is the natural story; and Josephus corroborates it, both by what he says and what he leaves unsaid.

Mr. Martin's "little theory of his own" has been, unfortunately, anticipated. I have stated that I thought the Nazarenes were probably a branch from the Essenes. I have shown in "The Gospels Unveiled" that the doctrines of Jesus, and even some of his words, and concealments by parables that "hearing men might hear and not understand," were precisely the views, words, and methods of the Essenes. As the Nazarenes discovered a prophecy somewhere, or made it, "he shall be called a Nazarene," I have concluded that there was some real personage whom they wished to identify with themselves. That the writer of Matthew's application of this prophecy was forced and false, I have discredited by showing we have no account of a city of Nazareth at this time, and that no one, outside of the gospel writers, refers to Jesus as "Jesus of Nazareth." That the Nazarenes were one of the earliest Christian sects is proved by the accusation made against Paul that he was "a ringleader of the sect of Nazarenes." In fact, I think my summary of the matter cannot be improved upon, until new sources of information are obtained—which may never be.

DAVID ECCLES.

The Sin of Prosperity.

Is it a sin to acquire wealth? Nothing is taught more unequivocally in the Bible than that it is a sin to be wealthy, regardless of the means. When I was younger than I am now, when my financial condition was worse than at the present time, and I was more envious than I now believe myself to be, the stories of the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Camel and the Needle's Eye, Money the Root of all Evil, the Rich Man whose soul was required of him because he had made a good crop, and all else on the same line, were very consoling to me. I thought it would be delightful to revel in the luxuries of heaven while my prosperous neighbors suffered the torments of the damned. I believed it was sinful to prosper in this world, but that it would be proper to abound in unlimited wealth in the next. It was a sin for my neighbor to gather gold here, but it would be perfectly right for me to tread on streets of gold hereafter. It was very wrong for my successful neighbor to wear jewels now, but it would be quite right for me to wear a gorgeous crown in eternity, and finger a harp of gold. The absurdity of my wearing a crown (the insignia of royalty) did not once occur to my mind. I did not consider that the crown is the sign of authority to rule over others—over whom, forsooth? For everybody else was to be crowned likewise.

Of course my thoughts on this line were suggested by the Christian creed, and of course I could enjoy such anticipations only on account of unrestrained envy. I do not believe that any other passion could have become so dominant in my soul as to incite such cruel sentiments. But I was a Christian at that time, and such thoughts, and such sentiments, go with the belief in heaven and hell. Naturally an orthodox Christian cannot believe his good God created a hell for the rich without believing it was right for him to do so. I have heard many Christians rejoice in the blessed hope that in the next world they would triumph over those they envy here.

Jesus and his disciples taught that prosperity was sinful. They never tried to accumulate any property themselves, so far as we know. The worst hell they could imagine was deemed the just reward for those who are industrious, economical, and prudent enough to acquire wealth. Yet orthodox Christians get as much filthy lucre as they can, without any very grave apprehensions of the penalty. The hell sentence which Jesus pronounced against the rich was an outgushing of envy against those who counted for more, at that time, than Jesus himself did. For, bear in mind, though Jesus was apotheosized after his death, and billions of wealth have been gathered since by his followers, in his name, yet at that time he was a wanderer who had nowhere to lay his head; and when he wanted a burro to ride, he did not have the wherewithal to buy one.

It is of no use to waste time proving that there is no hell. Those who believe in it are too stupid to be convinced, however plainly and conclusively the arguments might be presented. There have been also, and are, those who have such desperate desires to punish their enemies, that they madly hope to see them suffer after death. The man who seeks to lift his race to a higher level is denounced by those he would benefit.

"Truths would'st thou teach to save a sinking land,
All fear, none aid you, and few understand."

Long ago it became profitable for religious impostors to appeal to the malevolence of the very large class of small souls; to make extravagant promises and extravagant threats, in the name of the gods, and thus excite the rabble to extravagant measures. Whoever will teach the most impossible, the most absurd, the most ridiculous, and the most disgusting doctrines, has always succeeded best.

Every orthodox Christian in the world endorses infinite punishment, else he is not orthodox. If he questions the reality of hell, the justice of infinite punishment for finite crime, the compatibility of this with infinite mercy, then he is a skeptic, and not orthodox. Preachers love to shut the doors of heaven against the rich; but never refuse to open their own doors with obsequious deference. I have never heard, however, a sermon in defense of prosperity. Perhaps prosperity needs no defense.

It is reasonable and consistent to suppose that Dives was industrious, honest, frugal, and prudent. No doubt he loved his family, and was willing to work and economize for their benefit. No doubt he worked for them during the day, and stayed with them during the night. His prosperity indicates as much. Remember we are not considering multimillionaires and giant trusts. Such did not exist in those times.

It is more than likely that Lazarus spent his days in idleness, and his nights in dissipation, whence that loathsome disease which covered him with sores. Dives was rich. Lazarus was poor, and he begged of Dives. This is about all we know of those important personages. There is no evidence that Lazarus ever did anything good, nor that Dives ever did evil. Lazarus begged. We do not know whether Dives gave to him or not. Perhaps he did. In the absence of any information on that point, we judge from the rule, and as a rule men in good circumstances give to beggars. If this had been any exception, Jesus should have said so, for it would have made his case better.

But let us assume that Lazarus may have been as industrious, economical, honest and prudent as Dives, and that he was poor because of his incapacity for business. Then what? Why was he industrious and economical unless he wanted property? If he wanted property and could not acquire it, he differed from Dives only in the one item of capacity. And his incapacity sent the other fellow to hell!

There are good men who are poor; but it was not their poverty that made them good. Other things being equal, the well-to-do should be more virtuous than the poor. The same man will find it easier to be honorable when in easy circumstances than when in extremities. "Lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (Prov. xxx, 9).

When a man is blind with envy, he does not see all of these points. Envy alone could have drawn such a picture in the mind of Jesus. He places Dives in the flames of hell, suffering for water, and Lazarus in heaven, leaning on the bosom of Abraham, who, of course, had never experienced an avaricious impulse! It is not thinkable that Dives obtained his wealth by means more questionable than Abraham's deal with Pharaoh. I am willing for him and Lazarus to go together. I do not approve the way he treated his maid Hagar, nor his reviling of Dives for having been rich, when he too had been rich and had gotten his wealth by dishonorable means. He denied the sufferer a drop of water, and why? What was the heinous crime of Dives? "In yonder world you had good things while Lazarus had evil things. Now, you are tormented while he is comforted." Evidently the prosperity of Dives was his only sin.

So with the rich farmer whose industry was rewarded with a bountiful crop, and he said: "I will pull down my barns and build greater, and therein will I bestow all of my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul! thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." But what was the response? "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." Here, again, prosperity was the only sin. For producing a large crop, and preparing to enjoy it, he was called a fool, and was condemned to death.

The young man who knelt to Jesus, and asked what he should do to obtain eternal life was told to keep the commandments. But the young man had always kept the commandments, and had of course observed that others who kept them died just the same. So he seemed to think that too unlikely of results, and he rejoined, "All these things have I kept from my youth up: What lack I yet?"

What was the penance imposed? "Sell whatever thou hast and give to the poor" (Jesus and his disciples were the poor), "and thou shalt have treasures in heaven."

There was no objection to aught the young man had done. There was no accusation from any quarter. It was not even complained that he had gotten his wealth by unfair means. He seemed to have been all that Jesus wished him to be. That he had kept the commandments Jesus accepted as a fact; and Jesus loved him. Yet Jesus offered him eternal life only on the condition that he should give away his property and become poor.

"Then said Jesus unto his disciples, Verily I say unto you, that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven."

"And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God."

"Woe unto you that are rich; for you have received your consolation."

In all these fulminations the means by which the wealth was obtained is disregarded.

Jesus and his disciples were Communists. They thought it would be right for the prosperous to divide their savings. The preachers of the present time are more compromising. If one will divide a liberal part of what he has, they are willing for him to keep a stake from which to earn more. They do not recognize that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Had the young man and all the rest of the world obeyed the command to dispose of everything and become dependent, the business affairs of the country must have suffered. "Panic" would not have spelt it.

Peter did not believe it was right for Ananias and his wife to have any part of the proceeds of their property. He wanted all for himself and his group, and not getting it, killed the unhappy couple, the young men carrying them out and burying them. The funerals seem to have been rather precipitate.

There are people who never try to see the other side of a proposition. This narrowness hinders their understanding even of the one side. We can imagine the glorious things the future may have in store for the race; but for the succor of the poor at the present time it appears necessary for some to be rich. We should try to grasp the ultimate issue instead of the immediate aspect of the proposition. Had I a hundred thousand dollars to use for the benefit of the people of my county, some might insist that the right way to do it would be to divide it equally among them. That would give each individual about three dollars. Very few of them would thereby be perceptibly benefited, although my disposition of the money would certainly seem unselfish. But should I build a factory, and employ the idle, thus giving them a chance to support themselves, meanwhile increasing my own wealth, and building more factories, and bringing more men into the county to earn money and spend it, people might think me selfish. Such an industry would, however, be worth many times three dollars apiece to the people of the county. "True self-love and social are the same."

The wealthy man is not necessarily vile, and it is madness to hope that in eternity we shall gaze with tranquil pleasure at the exemplification of the Dives affair; for Christianity is not true, and prosperity is not a sin.

We are ruined, not by what we really want, but by what we think we do; therefore, never go abroad in search of your wants; if they be real wants, they will come home in search of you: for he that buys what he does not want will soon want what he can not buy.—C. C. Colton.

In heads replete with thoughts of other men;
Wisdom in minds attentive to their own.

What Are Governments For?

What are governments for? Either to enslave men or to free them. Every monarchy on earth is a system of slavery; every republic on earth is an antislavery society. The lesson of the past, and the present, is that slaveholders do not free their slaves; men and women must gain their freedom for themselves or be forever slaves. In what is called a free republic the liberty of man is the governmental ideal. All laws should buttress the freedom won and open the way to win greater freedom. Ignorance does not appreciate liberty, nor understand its mighty opportunities for happiness. There must be education of every child in a republic to the value of individual liberty. Every attempt even to abridge political freedom is a crime, where liberty is regarded as the greatest human blessing.

It behooves lovers of right and truth to protect from encroachment the freedom enjoyed by man. What are you striving for? is the question which every institution and every organization in a country should be compelled to answer. Each man must be protected in his rights as a citizen, and no power must be allowed to trample upon those rights or to deprive man of his freedom to live and make his life a blessing.

When a republic allows an organization within its borders to usurp the delegated powers of government, it is time for the people to raise a cry of protest. The highest citizen must not trample upon the lowest. The religious man and women must not wrong the irreligious man and woman. There are no prerogatives recognized by a republic as the property of any class or school. Nothing is so high or so holy in a republic as the liberty of its citizens. That must not be violated.

A church or religious organization must enjoy no favors over any other organization, and must not upon any consideration teach or act in a way to deprive a person of his rights as a citizen.

It is time for our country to deal with its enemies; time to call a halt on religious encroachments; time to say to the priest: You must respect the laws of this nation; you must not pretend to love our flag and put a foreign flag above it; you must not through your dupes oppress those who differ from you on religious or other questions. To save America we must cut off the hand that is aiming a blow at its heart.

To give greater emphasis to my words, I wish to say that a citizen of the United States, a resident of the city of Detroit, Michigan, was arrested one hundred and ten times in one year for what? For selling a newspaper on the streets. Who were the complainants in this matter? Roman Catholic policemen ostensibly, the Roman Catholic church really, for a policeman would not act without instructions. Mr. Edward F. Jocque was the man thus persecuted and The Menace was the paper which he sold and which sent the cold chills down the spine of the Roman church.

Now, I claim it to be the duty of our government to protect that man from the persecutions of the Roman Catholic church, and I claim further that it is the duty of our government to stop all appropriations of all kinds to this church, and I also claim that this church is the deadliest foe of our free institutions.

Is our government dead, or in the grasp of Rome, that such an outrage can take place in a large city of this country and be overlooked by the authorities at Washington? Is our daily press paralyzed with fear of Romanism, that it is guiltily silent at such a shameful crime? If the nation is asleep, let it wake up before it is too late to save itself. Rome hates this government; hates its founders, and hates the liberty those brave men secured for posterity. The poison of the Tiber has been injected into our national veins, but the majority of our people are lovers and defenders of the right.

Let that majority act.

Rev. F. M. Goodchild and Hell.

In a sermon delivered in the Central Baptist church of New York on Sunday evening, January 14, the Rev. F. M. Goodchild made an attack upon Prof. Felix Adler regarding the latter's statement that there is no such place as hell. He accused the professor of teaching a "fearsome doctrine that would turn the world into a hell in which even Germany's ruthless philosophy would seem mild."

There is a fundamental principle of ethics that the merits of an action are determined by the motives which underlie the action. Honesty may be the best policy, but a man that is honest simply because of this motive is certainly not ethical. No one has attained to the highest conception of moral rectitude who refrains from wrong-doing because of the fear of punishment. We have often heard it said by Christian religionists that were it not for the fear of hell they would live a life of complete abandon, gratifying themselves in every personal desire no matter what its character might be. This is the natural result of such teaching as Dr. Goodchild seems to advocate. To even suggest the fear of hell as a reason for living righteously rather than the love of righteousness for its own sake, is in itself an immoral and dangerous position, and is simply confirmatory of the Rationalist's criticism that Christianity is not a truly ethical religion.

In further arraignment Prof. Adler for his rejection of the hell idea, Dr. Goodchild asserts that the professor has made an announcement "that is welcome to every thief, to every liar, to every rascal in New York. He has ministered comfort to every foe of righteousness." We would like to ask this Christian preacher when it was that the fear of hell ever showed itself to be an effective deterrent from crime when the wrong-doer was unavoidably bent upon the accomplishment of his evil purpose. Like capital punishment, it has been an utter failure in the prevention of crime. In the case of the confirmed criminal, both capital punishment and the fear of hell have been absolutely negligible considerations. The fact that ninety-nine per cent. of our prison and reformatory inmates are Christians, who from earliest childhood had been frightened by revolting pictures of hell fire, is sufficient proof of the erroneousness and partiality of Dr. Goodchild's statement.

Contrary to the declaration that the denial of hell "ministers comfort to every foe of righteousness," we are strongly inclined to believe that no doctrine has so thoroughly aroused the evil tendencies in men and so persistently fostered the spirit of cruelty and inhumanity among the nations of the earth, as this notion of everlasting torture in a bottomless pit. It is said that "if God does not bother about punishing sin, why should man?" But the man who made this remark forgot this other and more practical question, that if God punishes man after the discipline of a fiend, without making the punishment fit the crime, why should not man punish his fellows after the same manner? That man has followed God's method in revenging offenses is well known to every reader of history. The doctrine of hell formed the basis for the activity of the agents of the "Holy Inquisition," who frequently explained their inhuman cruelty by saying that if they did not burn alive the heretics here, God would burn them forever in hell; so that it was well to anticipate the purposes of God here on this earth.

If hell be a falsehood, Dr. Goodchild thinks that "the law of the jungle is the right one, and only the strongest and the most cunning have any right to survive." It is evident that this preacher lives wholly in the present. He should immediately acquire a knowledge of Christianity during the period between the fourth and the twelfth centuries, which will inform him in what part of the world the moral "jungle" truly existed, and who, and what teachings, created it. It has been the immoral teachings of Christianity that has occasioned most of the sin and sorrow that this world has known; and the factor that has contributed most to this lamentable history has been that of the doctrine of an endless hell.

Thanks to our modern civilization and spirit of progress, there are few sensible people to-day, either in the church or out of it, who retain any appreciable belief in the unnatural theory of hell. The word serves no purpose to-day save as a "swear word," and even for that use it has lost all its impressiveness, and every whit of its terror.

The worthlessness of Dr. Goodchild's criticism and method of argumentation is best seen in his remark that "to be sure, Dr. Adler does not recognize the authority of Jesus Christ; but the world does. The world does not agree with Dr. Adler." This statement is so extraordinary that it is difficult to believe that any rational person made it. We know it is a common practice for preachers to indulge in extravagant remarks in the hope that their hearers will believe them, and in that way religion will meet with approval, and the pietistic cause be strengthened; but it is rarely that a preacher compromises the feeling of common honesty by an utterance that a school boy could disprove.

The world does not recognize the authority of Jesus Christ, nor ever has, nor ever will. There is less possibility of this to-day than ever in the history of the Christian church. The fact that theologians are writing prize essays on the evidences of Christianity, on the future of that religion, and that evangelists of a type of eccentricity that would not have been tolerated in the church twenty-five years ago are being engaged to help support a dying institution, is sufficient evidence that the partial hold that the thought of Christ once had upon some men's hearts is fast becoming simply a remembrance.

Life is too strenuous to-day to waste time in conning theological fables which have no pertinency to our day and generation. The demand to-day is for truth, ungarnished truth, absolute truth; and as the church has failed completely to meet this fundamental requirement of human nature, she has only herself to blame if men look to science and philosophy for the strength and solace which she promised, but miserably failed to bestow.

Dewey and Purdy.

The vulnerable point common to all men seems to be specially marked in heroes. The case of Samson, in the ancient Hebrew messiah-myth, is typical. So is that of the late Admiral George Dewey, the hero of Manila Bay. Samson was fleeced by a woman, and Dewey was shorn of prestige and property. Samson's liberty went to the Philistines, and Dewey's fame fell to the Catholics. The admiral returned from his exploits in the Philippines the crowned and laureled hero of the world. A great naval parade signalized his entrance to New York harbor on board his flagship Olympia. There were land fetes marked by long processions and the rearing of triumphal arches. Then appeared the woman, and upon the announcement of his coming marriage admiring Americans presented him with a beautiful home in Washington. People said the woman was an adventuress, which perhaps she was not, but she invited that criticism by permitting the admiral to convey the gift house to her. The nation murmured, for it had given the house to Admiral Dewey and not to Mrs. Mildred McLean Hazen, his Roman Catholic betrothed, and some of the indignant contributors thought they ought to have their money back. He perhaps would gladly have offered the house to the nation, and there is many a woman of good taste, who, seeing the attitude in which her husband had been placed by such an ill-considered act as Admiral Dewey's, would have insisted upon extricating him by returning the property. The Catholic Mrs. Dewey was not of that kind. She held on to the deed even when public criticism made the gift house untenable by her husband and he removed to another residence. It is said that she has discharged her conscience in the matter by conveying the premises to her church. Admiral Dewey was about fifteen years in recovering his reputation, living meanwhile in an obscurity comparable to that of a vice-president, although repeatedly advanced in rank.

When Commodore Dewey entered Manila bay with his fleet on the 1st of May, 1908, there was on board his flagship an old mariner named George H. Purdy, who had known him from his youth up. Purdy had been in the army or navy for more than thirty-five years. On the Olympia a privileged character, and an argumentative Freethinker, he was known as the Parson, being thereby distinguished from the chaplain, with whom frequently he held high discourse, and who was generally referred to among the crew as Holy Jo. It was Purdy's privilege to approach his commander familiarly; hence on that bright Sabbath morn he remarked to Dewey, "Commodore, I hope you are not going to fight on Sunday. The last Sunday fight I was in we got licked." That was at Chancellorsville, in 1863. It was Purdy with his deep-sea voice who in the Manila naval battle gave the watchword, "Remember the Maine!" and originated the less classical expression, "To hell with breakfast." He was Dewey's senior, probably, by ten years. He survived many battles by sea and land, and came through the disaster in Apia Bay, Samoa, nearly three decades ago, when hundreds were lost. He was on the Independence at Mare Island, Cal., when we first knew him; and it is likely that he was near four-score when he finally retired to the Soldiers' home in San Diego, where recently he died with the request that a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER should be placed in his coffin. So these glorious old fellows pass away, and the conditions that produced them are not likely to be repeated.

A Repetition.

One of our letter-writers wants THE TRUTH SEEKER to sink the Freethought question and go in for social uplift. That is a temptation perennially offered. Such advocacies as suffrage, birth-control, Socialism, and the whole line of social and economic reforms are from time to time recommended. But we might reply that all these have we kept from our youth up. THE TRUTH SEEKER has never "minimized" the importance of the agitation of these questions; it has indeed been one of the earliest among their agitators. Personally the present editor has kept next to them nearly all his life. He was a dues-paying member of the Socialist party in 1886, although his matured economic thought did not crystallize in exactly that form; and if he had not been at one time a good Philosophical Anarchist he would not have been the sole paid contributor to Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker's Liberty. The first outside reform that threatened the integrity of THE TRUTH SEEKER was Greenbackism. The founder of this paper was a Greenbacker and supported Peter Cooper for President. He also dipped into the uplift proposition and wrote of "The Ills We Endure: Their Cause and Cure," away back in the '70s. He also fell for Spiritualism, and anticipated Sir Oliver Lodge by a generation. Somebody said that THE TRUTH SEEKER was a "cave of Adulam," that is, a refuge for "everyone that was discontented." We can think of no movement not represented in its pages. It was in existence early enough to publish one of the first extended reviews of Henry George's "Progress and Poverty." Advocates of Fourierism used to write for it, as did the expounders of Comte's Positive Philosophy and the Religion of Humanity. In those days the Freethinkers at their meetings had to listen to all sorts of messages which now have their separate advocacies, organs and organizations. As the late Dr. Foote explained it, reforms multiply by fission," the original organism being the Liberal Club from which the others have split off. If there should happen to be one wandering about with no place to express itself, we should like to have it reported to us.

Older readers will remember that there was once a Liberal propaganda, represented by the Boston Index, which, aiming to keep along with the Higher Criticism, attracted what we would call the highbrows. It perhaps survives in the Free Religious Association, a cult that is indistinguishable from Unitarianism. We have been advised to get on that plane. One of our advisers, who said that Freethought would not recommend itself to large numbers while confined to biblical criticism and attacks on religion, made a series of attempts to establish highbrow Freethought papers; but all of them one after another failed, while THE TRUTH SEEKER kept on. A while ago we learned of the formation of a "syndicate" to acquire this paper and turn it into a Review, the writers for which should cover all the fields of reform. But this is an era of specializing. A paper must concentrate. If we were the editor of a Review it would be mainly devoted to subjects now occupying the attention of our readers. Any other editor would give Freethought only a Department.

It is not an accident that THE TRUTH SEEKER adheres to its somewhat exclusive lines. It is a policy, and we regard it as the only one compatible with the continued existence of the paper. A vehicle designed and advertised for conveying one sort of thought might make a failure if it went in for general trucking.

This is not the first suggestion received that we start a new "religion." That also is an old acquaintance. We have been told that people do not stick to Christianity because they like it, but because they have no substitute and are waiting for a better religion. That is a fallacy. If they want something better than orthodoxy, why not organize about Dr. Eliot's "Religion of the Future"? We have before remarked that the better a religion appears to be the fewer followers it has. There will be found among Freethinkers few to deny that Unitarianism is a better religion than Roman Catholicism. But compare the numbers of adherents to the two forms of faith—the best and the worst. Catholicism has Unitarianism beaten a thousand to one; and a religion less orthodox than the latter would draw still fewer after it.

Experience and observation prove the falsity of the notion that the religious mind is searching or waiting for enlightenment. It does not want a rational faith. That which grips the religious mind is superstition, because superstition has an answer to every question, and so promotes intellectual torpor and satisfaction. If the gentlemen who wish to introduce a new religion would propose some new superstition or reemphasize an old one, we should hardly doubt of their success.

If a thing is true, that is all we want to know about it; and if not true it becomes no less false by calling it a religion. The good and the true have no need to be presented as religion. The false alone avails itself of that artificial aid; so that when someone tells us he has a few propositions to offer in the form of a new religion our suspicions are at once aroused that among them are to be found some that will not bear the test of science and truth.

We have not met Cesare, except through his pictures that everyone else has seen, but we are familiar with his reputation as "the Ablest Cartoonist in America," and we know of his book of One Hundred Cartoons published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston. So the drawing that he has sent us this week to embellish Mr. van der Weyde's article on Paine is a gratifying surprise. Cesare has been described as the cartoonist who makes you think. In this instance, artist and subject are well met.

In commenting on the case of Michael Mockus, the Outlook concludes: "We hope later to read carefully and comment on the briefs which are to be submitted in this remarkable trial. Meanwhile, whether or not the prosecution of Mr. Mockus is a survival of ancient and outworn Puritanism, as his supporters claim, the general principle applying is, in our judgment, this: The right of free speech does not mean the right to libel in public individuals or associations; it does, however, mean the right to express opinions whether they are or are not agreeable to other people. If a Jew may say that the Christian religion is a false religion, as he certainly may, then a Freethinker may say that the Bible is uninspired and untrue; and however much we may differ from such statements, there is not or should not be in them any offense recognizable by law unless libel is involved or laws aimed to preserve public decency are outraged."

What do you think of the idea of writing, each one of us that has some phase of the subject to discuss, to the Outlook during this week? Possibly a shower of letters will evoke further recognition of the body of Freethinkers.

Here is our effort.

Editor of the Outlook, 381 Fourth Ave., New York City.—Dear Sir: Your statement regarding freedom of speech, in referring to the Mockus trial, is fair, and we take pleasure in sending you several copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER that contain details you may have missed.

Granting that different conclusions may be drawn from the same facts, and that we may be in error, will you not openly admit the following facts or refute them?

The stories in the Old Testament, the creation, the miracles and the anthropomorphic idea of God are not literally true.

The Four Gospels were not written until more than thirty years after the ascension, and the identity of the authors is in doubt.

The Epistle to the Hebrews was not by St. Paul.

The ideas in the Bible were previously prevalent in other religions; not only the virgin birth and trinity but almost every conception described in Scripture.

If these are facts, was not Mr. Mockus right in pointing them out?

If they are not facts, why not state that you do not consider that the mass of evidence which we strive to produce can outweigh the authority of the anonymous authors who wrote in days when science was young?

Yours very truly,

It has been suggested that a "flier" be printed, somewhat like the following to be sold at cost—less than a cent apiece—for distribution among people who have no knowledge of Freethought. They can be inserted in library books, in hotel Bibles, or fastened to bulletin boards, or mailed to friends, or can be doled out in various ways. If there is any demand, we shall have 5,000 printed to start with.

IMPORTANT OPINIONS ON RELIGION.

Thomas Jefferson said that Jehovah was "a being of terrific character—cruel, vindictive, capricious and unjust."

Andrew D. White, former president of Cornell, wrote: "The establishment of Christianity, beginning a new evolution of theology, arrested the normal development of the physical sciences for over 1,500 years."

The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "It is certain that the Synoptic Gospels took their present form only by degrees."

Canon Farrar admits that "if miracles be incredible, Christianity is false."

The Rev. Dr. R. Heber Newton wrote: "There is in fact, as we now see, nothing in the externals of the Christian church which is not a survival from the churches of paganism."

Dr. Lyman Abbott writes: "Jesus Christ did not come to found a new religion."

IMPORTANT FACTS ABOUT THE BIBLE.

It was written by men, translated by men, selected from various early writings by vote of men.

It represents man's idea of God in olden times when the miraculous was a common belief.

In the creation described in Genesis i and ii, were the beasts created before or after man?

The genealogy in Matthew i states: "And Jacob begat Joseph," while the same genealogy in Luke iii states: "Joseph which was the son of Heli." These authors are the sole gospel authorities for the impossibility of the descent through Joseph.

IMPORTANT SEARCH FOR TRUTH.

Which of the Christian doctrines do you believe? Miraculous birth, atonement, miracles, crucifixion, resurrection, ascension?

SCOPE OF BLASPHEMY LAWS

Blackstone's Critics—Continuation of the Quotation from Furneaux's Letters to Blackstone.

By THEODORE SCHROEDER.

"In using the phrase, 'the singular notions of a particular man,' you [Blackstone] put the case very favorably for drawing your own conclusion. To be sure, if a man adopts sentiments which never entered into anybody's head but his own, or which no one will embrace when proposed, the odds are against him. But this is not often the case; and is not so, in particular, with regard to the debate between the Church and the Dissenters; the point here in question. However, he who treats the notions of others with a rude contempt, does, I think, in most cases, appear to affect a sort of superiority, (call it arrogance, or insolence, if you please,) which usually ill becomes him who assumes it, and is never very agreeable to those who are the objects of it."

"But with relation to the query, Who have the fairest chance of being in the right? those who follow the lead of a public establishment? or those who are, or profess to be, impartial enquirers after truth? that, I think, is not so clear, at least on one side of the question, as you seem to imagine."

"Most establishments even those which have been settled by authority of the civil power, have originated from the clergy; at least, with respect to their formularies of doctrine and worship; and the magistrate hath had little more to do in the affair, than to establish what hath been already prepared to his hands. Let us, then, look into ecclesiastical history, and see what the councils, synods, convocations, and other general, national, or provincial assemblies of the clergy, have, for the most part, been, from the first famous and revered Council of Nice, down to the last session of our own convocation in England. When I reflect on the policy and artifice used in the management of such assemblies; on their obsequiousness to the caprices of princes and ministers of state; or of potent ecclesiastics, and even of some of their own ambitious and turbulent members; on their prejudices and passions, their private and party views, their scandalous animosities and contentions; on the small majorities by which questions of importance, intended to bind not only the men of that age but their posterity, have been determined; on the respectable characters which have often appeared in the minor number; and above all, on their self-contradictions, and their mutual censures and anathemas; I say, when I consider these things, I own, they somewhat abate my reverence for the determinations of such bodies."

"The third article which you [Blackstone] exhibit against reviling the liturgy, is, that it resolves in it 'ingratitude, by denying indulgence and liberty of conscience to the members of the national church.' There would be little room, surely, Sir, to complain of violations of liberty of conscience; if, in contending for their respective dogmas, men never went beyond contemning and ridiculing one another; for, however censurable this may be, it certainly is not denying them liberty of conscience; that always implies restraint or compulsion, ideas very different from contempt and ridicule."

"But perhaps, reviling the liturgy may be censured, as ungrateful, on account of the toleration indulged to Dissenters. It is not, however, to the Church the Dissenters are peculiarly indebted for this blessing. For though her governors promised them every mark of Christian temper and brotherly affection, when her fears of Popery ran high in the reign of James the Second; yet, as soon as the storm subsided, these promises were, in great measure, forgotten. It is to that great prince, King William, to whom the British constitution and liberties owe their preservation and security; and to those renowned patriots who first engaged, and then supported him, in the glorious enterprise; it is to those, and such as those, the Dissenters are, under God, alone obliged for their deliverance from unjust violence and oppression; and for being restored in part, to their natural rights by the toleration. I say, to their natural rights; for religious liberty is one of those rights to which men are entitled by nature; as much so, as to their lives and properties; and it should be remembered, therefore, that the Dissenters cannot be justly reckoned to be any more obliged to those who kindly do not again deprive them of it; than they are to those who as kindly do not seize on their estates, or take away their lives; an obligation which, I suppose, hath never been esteemed a reason for any peculiar gratitude."

"And, now, Sir, notwithstanding the exceptions which I have taken to your premises, I will leave you in full possession of your conclusion; I will suppose, that the crime of reviling the liturgy is a complication of 'indecent, arrogance, and ingratitude'; and I will add, moreover, that it may possibly imply (and I think it is the principal thing that can be implied in it, though you have not at all mentioned it), great malignity and inveteracy against the church. But, surely, to confiscate a man's goods, and imprison him for life, for any degree of any of these evil dispositions towards the church, when discovered only by words, (though it be frequently, and they be ever so open and explicit) and not by any injurious and dangerous overt acts; must be considered, one would think, by persons of humanity, and doubtless, therefore, by you, Sir, upon further reflection to be somewhat too severe and intolerant. Notwithstanding all the bitterness with which the puritans inveighed against the offices of the church (and which they did not do, till by oppression they were provoked almost to madness) the passing this act, in my opinion, discovered a very intolerant spirit in those who, at that time, had the conduct of public affairs."

"But perhaps it may be said that this measure was adopted only out of prudence, for the security of the national establishment. You inform us, that 'the terror of these laws (for, you say they seldom or never were executed) proved a principal means, under Providence, of preserving the purity as well as decency of our national worship.' Which, give me leave to say, Sir, is passing no great compliment upon the national worship."

"But however that may be: what had the church to fear from the reviling of the puritans, that she must fence herself around with human terrors? We are to suppose she had all the truth and argument, as well as the encouragement of the civil magistrate on her side. In this case, having recourse to human terrors was bringing disgrace on a good cause, and doing credit to a bad one. For the presumption, in most men's minds, is always in favor of the cause which is oppressed and persecuted; and that this is the case is owing, partly to a certain generosity in mankind, which inclines them to side with the weakest, and those who are ill-treated; and partly to a persuasion, which appears not wholly unreasonable, that while argument can be maintained, terror will not be employed. And for my own part, I am persuaded, that the church, instead of insuring its safety by these methods greatly increased the number of its enemies, and inflamed their animosity and inveteracy. Had the governors of the church or state, at that time, made a few concessions, such as not only the puritans, but many wise and great men in the church, desired; or, in case they had indulged and tolerated those puritans, who could not in conscience conform; it is my opinion, the church would have been in no more danger from the puritans of that age, than it is now in from the Dissenters of this. Such severe laws occasioned the very crime they were intended to prevent; for they imbibed men's spirits, and inflamed their passions; and when the mind is greatly irritated, it is hardly in human nature to speak with temper and moderation, either of those by whom, or of that for which, men feel themselves ill-treated and oppressed."

"I would further observe (and it is an observation I would submit to a gentleman of your profession, in particular) that, on supposition this act was levelled only, as you seem to imagine, against the bitter reproaches and insults of the puritans, it seems to have been drawn with too great a latitude of expression. I believe you will admit, and, I think, you have somewhere said something like it, that it is the excellence of any law to define offences and punishments with the utmost precision that the subject may know distinctly what is lawful and what is forbidden. But is this the case with the act before us, supposing it to be designed merely against reviling and outraging the offices of the church? For, what is the precise idea of one who declares, or speaks anything, in open words, in derogation of the common prayer? Surely under an expression of such latitude may be included every man, who openly declares his disapprobation of it, or as the act expressly saith, of anything therein contained, or any part thereof; that is any one who gives any of his reasons for not joining in the offices of the church; and he may, by a willing judge and jury, nay, ought, according to the literal sense of the words, to be convicted upon this statute. Now supposing this law was intended only, as you seem to think, against insulting and reviling the liturgy; can so good a lawyer as Dr. Blackstone approve of a statute, which is so worded as to comprehend persons who are entirely innocent of the crime intended?"

"But in truth, I cannot help thinking, that it was the actual intention of those who promoted this act, to put an effectual stop, if possible, to the puritans' arguments as well as to their revilings; and that, on this account, the act was so expressed, as to include every man who finds fault with the common prayer, though only in a way of argument. For certainly, that is, 'in open words speaking in derogation of it.' The intent of the act at that time, I am afraid, was, to prevent the questioning any part of the service of the church, either in a way of reasoning or reviling."

"Before Dr. Blackstone, therefore, had declared his approbation of this statute, and much more of the continuance of it to the present time, he should have considered, what persons and what cases, according to its literal and just construction, and perhaps according to its original intention, may be affected by it; and whether he would chuse to vindicate it in its full extent. In every view it appears to me very surprising, that you, Sir, who have expressed yourself, on various occasions, with so much liberality of sentiment, should think 'the continuance of this act not too severe and intolerant.'" (Furneaux's Letters on Toleration, Letter IV, v. 1, 2d ed., pp. 94-116.)

This ends the quotations from Furneaux. It is believed that enough has been shown to make it very plain that this friend of free speech repudiated all the arguments of moral sentimentalism, which either the past or present friends of blasphemy laws put forth in justification. Neither he nor any other friend of complete mental freedom ever dreamed of contenting themselves with arguing against previous restraint. The censorship laws which had provided for previous restraint had been repealed for nearly four score years when Furneaux wrote his criticism of Blackstone's endorsement of then existing intolerance. The demand was not for relief from previous restraint, but relief from subsequent punishment, and repudiation of the excuse of mere tendency for inflicting that punishment. The demand was for a resort only to overt acts to produce actual and material injury, as the basis of the magistrate's jurisdiction.

Bentham on Free Speech.

Furneaux had his mind focussed on religious toleration, but by insisting on an overt act as the only proper basis of suppression or test of crime and in opposing a mere guess about a psychologic tendency as criteria of guilt, he furnished a general standard of judgment, applicable to all problems of free speech that can arise under our constitutions. Jeremy Bentham, another of the distinguished critics of Blackstone, approached the problem of free speech more from the point of view of a political and parliamentary reformer. The interesting and important thing about it is that Bentham reaches the same conclusion as Furneaux, namely, that if intellectual liberty is to be maintained we must abolish speculations about psychologic tendencies as the criteria of guilt, and substitute therefor overt acts, actually constituting real disturbance and real injury. Jeremy Bentham, in his criticism of Blackstone's views on free speech says:

"In regard to a government that is free and one that is despotic, wherein is it then that the difference consists? . . . On the liberty of the press; or the security with which every man, be he of the one class or the other, may make known his complaints and remonstrances to the whole community; on the liberty of public association; on the security with which malcontents may communicate their sentiments, concert their plans, and practice every mode of opposition short of actual revolt, before the executive power can be legally justified in disturbing them." (Bentham's Fragment on Government, p. 15.)

Certain it is that work, worry, labor, and trouble form the lot of almost all men their whole life long. But if all wishes were fulfilled as soon as they arose, how would men occupy their lives? What would they do with their time? If the world were a paradise of luxury and ease, a land flowing with milk and honey, where every Jack obtained his Jill at once and without any difficulty, men would either die of boredom or hang themselves; or there would be wars, massacres, and murders; so that in the end mankind would inflict more suffering on itself than it has now to accept at the hands of Nature.—Arthur Schopenhauer.

The wise man is thoughtful and modest. He clings to facts. Beyond his intellectual horizon he does not pretend to see. He does not mistake hope for evidence or desire for demonstration. He is honest. He deceives neither himself nor others.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

JOHN'S GOSPEL EXAMINED.

It was Not Written by the Apostle; Its Theology Is Mithraism; Its Jesus a Myth.

The Gospel according to St. John is the greatest theological book in the New Testament, but those who expect to find it replete with truth and historical facts will be disappointed. It was composed for theological instruction; "written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ" (John xx, 31); written like any other catechism to teach Christian theology, "that believing ye might have life through his name." While it is the greatest book of Christian fiction extant, it contradicts every other book in the New Testament except the First Epistle of John, which is by the same unknown Greek theologian.

It was not the apostle John who wrote this gospel: "And he that saw it bare record and his record is true" (xix, 35). It was not even an eye-witness who wrote it: "And we know that his testimony is true" (xxi, 24). When the author of the fourth gospel buried Jesus on Thursday, before the beginning of the Passover, the apostle John was looking with Peter for a place to eat the passover meal with his master (Luke xxii, 8).

Remsburg, in "The Christ" (p. 56), says: "The internal evidence against the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel is conclusive. The apostle John did not write it. John, the apostle, was a Jew; the author of the Fourth Gospel was not a Jew. John was born at Bethsaida; the author of the Fourth Gospel did not know where Bethsaida was located. John was an uneducated fisherman; the author of this Gospel was an accomplished scholar. Some of the most important events in the life of Jesus, the Synoptics declare, were witnessed by John; the author of this knows nothing of these events. The apostle John witnessed the crucifixion; the author of this gospel did not. The apostles, including John, believed Jesus to be a man; the author of the Fourth Gospel believed him to be a god."

Tradition has it that the Gospel of John was written at Ephesus. I believe the work was composed at Alexandria. The first chapter contains a word-for-word copy from the writings of the Alexandrian Jew Philo on the philosophical system of the "Logos" (the word) by Plato. Philo wrote a hundred years before the appearance of this gospel. "The people took branches of palm trees" (xii, 13). In Alexandria were many palm trees, and a yearly festival of palms was celebrated. Jerusalem never grew palm trees wild in public streets! The winters are too cold (x, 22), and the altitude of 2,500 feet above sea level does not permit palm trees. "Peter then denied again; and immediately the cock crew" (xviii, 27). Not a single rooster, an unclean animal, was kept in Jerusalem near the palace of the high priest; chickens were numerous in Alexandria. The mocking of Carabas (In Flaccum, VI), written by Philo 100 years before the mocking of Jesus in John, and the ideas taken from the religion of the Egyptian Osiris, point toward Alexandria.

Like Matthew, the original skeleton of the Gospel of John is Jewish-Christian and pro-Jewish, but the finished language of the present Gospel is Alexandrian and anti-Jewish, although the gospel shows more knowledge of Jewish history, law and custom than the Synoptics.

The Greek Gospel of John appeared shortly after A. D. 175, being first quoted by Irenæus. Throughout the gospel the Jewish teacher Jehoshua from Galilee is called "Jesus of Nazareth," which should be "Jesus the Nazarene" (Matt. ii, 23). There can nowhere be found an allusion or a quotation of the name "Nazareth" except in the second century gospels and the Acts, in Christian liturgy and in a report of the church father Epiphanius, who died in 403 A. D. In the Talmud and by the Mohammedans the Christians are still called "the Nazarenes," as they were 1,800 years ago in Acts xxiv, 5. Paul does not know anything about Nazareth in his Epistles, and favors the descent of Jesus from David (Rom. i, 3; Tim. ii, 8).

The philosophy copied from Philo, "In the beginning was the Word," is an hypothesis; who was there to explain and verify? It reads as if Jehovah created the world out of nothing, when he pronounced the magic word "Jesus." Matt. xi, 14, says John the Baptist is Elias, and John i, 21, says he is not. Jesus is the messiah, the son of God (John i, 18, 27, 34), but the same John the Baptist sends two of his disciples to inquire into the messiahship of Jesus (Matt. xi, 3). "These things were done in Bethabara beyond Jordan" (i, 28). It is known that Origen inserted Bethabara in the place of "Bethany." The text of the New Testament has been undergoing changes and alterations from the time of Paul in the first century until Erasmus in A. D. 1500.

Jesus turned more than 100 gallons of water into strong wine after the "men had well drunk." The disciples of Jesus have often shown a disposition to be also good disciples of Bacchus. The purging of the temple by Jesus is according to Origen an allegory, following the quotation, Ps. lxxix, 9, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." The money-changers were there by necessity. The building of the temple during forty-six years (ii, 20) is wrong; no Jew-Christian wrote this part of the gospel. It took the Jewish priests one year and six months from 19-17 B. C. to build the splendid temple of Herod (Josephus, book 15, chap. xi.).

"Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (iii, 3) was an old dogma of Persian Mithraism. "The wind bloweth . . . and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh" (iii, 8). Spiritualism is not proven by the direction and sound of the wind. "No man has ascended up to heaven" (iii, 13). Then the ascensions of Elijah, Enoch, Mary, etc., are false. "The only begotten Son of God" (iii, 18) is contradicted by Genesis, Job, Luke and other quotations in the Bible. Matthew and Luke originally had Jesus come into this world like any other human being, but the church father Justin and Hebrews v, 5, have the spirit of Christ enter the human body of Jesus at the moment of his baptism. Like Melchisedec (Heb. v, 6) Christ had no human father or mother (Heb. vii, 3; Ps. ii, 7). The modern dogma of the birth of Jesus is a compromise.

"He must increase, but I must decrease" (iii, 30) is oriental astrology and has reference to Horus, the rising sun, and Osiris, the setting sun, of the Egyptians; also to the two torch-bearers upon the monuments of Mithra.

John iv, 1, contradicts Mark i, 5. The disciples of Jesus cannot baptize more people than John, if he baptized all Judea and Jerusalem. Sychar in Samaria is a geographical error (iv, 5); it should be Shechem (Joshua xxiv, 32). "The father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son" (v, 22). The judgment of the dead by Jesus is borrowed from the religions of Mithra and Osiris.

This next contradiction within the John gospel proves the authorship of two writers: "If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true" (v, 31). "If I bear record of myself, yet my record is true" (viii, 14). The feeding of the five thousand is an allegory formed after Num. xi, 21; Ps. lxxviii, 24, 25, and 2 Kings iv, 43. The miracle of Jesus walking about six miles over the Sea of Galilee during a storm is taken from Job ix, 8, "walking upon the sea as upon a pavement" (Septuagint).

"Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?" (vii, 42). During the first century Jesus was a man; during the second century he became identified with the logos of Philo and was deified after the fashion of Mithra and Apollo. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you" (vi, 53)—a cannibalistic command of the Persian Mithra. "For neither did his brethren believe in him" (vii, 5); why should we believe in an imitation of a Persian god?

"I go not up unto this feast" (viii, 8-10). "Yet" is interpolated and Jesus is guilty of deception, for he went, notwithstanding his assertion that he would not.

"Out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water" (viii, 38). This passage is especially edifying when translated into the French language: rivers of brandy (l'eau de vie). "This is the Christ" (vii, 41) who came out of Galilee and not out of Bethlehem-Judah, so his birth in the city of David is a myth. The Gospels of Mark and John state that there was no "babe of Bethlehem," and the Epistles of Paul prove there was no "Jesus of Nazareth!"

"Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet" (vii, 52). Jesus came out of Galilee, where also Elijah, Jonah, Hosea and Nahum were born. Jew-Christians did not write this part of the gospel, but Greeks, who also wrote: "Ye are of your father the devil" (viii, 44). Jesus is thus addressing a Jewish audience!

"Thou art not yet fifty years old" (viii, 57) contradicts Luke iii, 23, where Jesus is thirty years old, in conformity with Numbers iv. The translation of Siloam (ix, 7) is not sent, but "aqueduct."

"All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers" (x, 8). The Greek gospel writers again are slandering the Jews. If Jesus repeats from Psalm lxxxii, 6, "Ye are gods and all of you are children of the most High," how can the Jews accuse Jesus of blasphemy (xix, 7), when it was the business of every orthodox Jew to be a child of Jehovah? (John viii, 41.) "His disciples (all Jews) say unto him, Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee" (xi, 8). This is not the language of Jews, but of Greeks.

Jesus raiseth Lazarus, who had been dead four days. Above the main entrance into the church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem is a bas-relief, showing the resurrection of Lazarus, and the Jews, except Jesus and Lazarus, hold their noses shut with their fingers, because Martha saith: "Lord, by this time he stinketh" (xi, 39).

That Mary, the sister of Lazarus, anointed the feet of Jesus (xii, 3) is contradicted by Matt. xxvi, 7, "she poured the ointment on his head," and Luke vii, 37, "a woman, which was a sinner." There are but too many contradictions in the New Testament that are unknown to the average Christian!

The entry of Jesus into Jerusalem is impossible during the occupation of the city by the Roman soldiers.

"If a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die," "it bringeth forth much fruit" (xii, 24). If the corn of wheat dies, it bringeth forth nothing; only if it keeps living does it produce. The false conclusion of John is the reason why Jesus must die to save the world.

"I am come a light into the world; I am come to save the world; the word that I have spoken shall judge him in the last day" (xii, 46-48). The very doctrines of Persian Mithraism! "I am the way, the truth and the life" (xiv, 6). The teachings of Mithra!

"Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, I will do it" (xiv, 14). "Ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you" (xv, 7). "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you" (xvi, 23). Vain and empty words! It has been tried millions of times, with uniform failure.

With chapter xviii begins the grand finale of the first act. In the bright moonlight before the Passover, the Jews (who had no commission or authority to arrest anybody) come with burning "lanterns and torches and weapons" to arrest Jesus of Galilee. When he says: "I am Jesus," they were so surprised that "they went backward, and fell to the ground," from stepping upon one another's toes. Then hot-headed Simon Peter, holding in his left hand the sharp "sword" (which he used in the fish business), cut off the right ear of Malchus, the servant of the high priest. Then said Jesus unto Peter, Put up thy sword! Jesus, for making this remark, was bound and led to the father-in-law of the high priest. The mother-in-law was not able to receive them on account of the nocturnal hour. Simon Peter followed in the distance. "Then said the damsel," that answered the door-bell of the high priest: "You are a disciple of this man." Peter said to her: "You're mistaken." Girls never keep doors in the Orient. In fact, everybody sleeps all night at Jerusalem. They may have used lanterns in Alexandria; in Jerusalem lanterns were unknown. There is one high priest at xviii, 19-22, and another one at verse 24 and 26. The Jews never clamored for the crucifixion of a rabbi, who is repeatedly beaten, or for the lingering death of a Jew a few hours before or during their holy Passover. In this manner the Greeks have described events at Jerusalem, after the city was totally destroyed for a hundred years.

In the Gospel of John, Jesus is crucified Thursday afternoon, three days before Easter Sunday, at the same hour when the Jewish paschal lamb is sacrificed (xviii, xix, 14). Jesus is the true paschal lamb (i, 29, 36; xix, 36). The synoptics are equally certain that Jesus inaugurated the Greek-Persian eucharist or Holy Supper on Thursday evening and was, after trials during the night, crucified on Friday, the first day of Holy Passover, when the Jesus of John was already one night and one day in his grave (Matt. xxvi, 17; Mark xiv, 12; Luke xxii, 7, 8). But ye have a custom, that I should release unto you one at the Passover" (John xviii, 39). In all their history the Jews never had such a custom. The news must have reached Alexandria that sometimes the emperors in Rome released a prisoner at their birthday festivals.

The crucifixion of Jesus is Christian mythology. "I gave my back to the smiters" (Isa. i, 6), therefore Jesus is scourged. "He opened not his mouth" (Isa. liii, 7), and "Jesus gave him no answer" (John xix, 9). "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness (Num. xxi, 9), even so must the Son of man be lifted up" (John iii, 14). This is the origin of the story and the reason for the crucifixion of Jesus. "He was numbered with the transgressors" (Isa. liii, 12); Jesus was crucified between two thieves, when thieves were never crucified by Roman procurators. Isa. liii, 3-12, is almost a description of the martyrdom of Jesus. "They part by garments among them and cast lots upon my vesture" (Ps. xxii, 18), and the soldiers part his garments and cast lots for his coat, when "garments and vesture" in the Psalm is only a rhetorical reduplication in Jewish poetry. "In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink" (Ps. lxix, 21), and Jesus receives a sponge full of vinegar. "Neither shall ye break a bone thereof" (Ex. xxii, 46); "they brake not his legs." "They shall look upon me whom they have pierced" (Zech. xii, 10), and "a soldier with a spear pierced his side." "He made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death" (Isa. liii, 9), and Jesus is buried by Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews. "Thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption" (Ps. xvi, 10), and Jesus rises again from the grave!

"The place of a skull, which is called in Hebrew Golgotha" (xix, 17); the Hebrew language never had such a word. The Latin term "calvaria" or "calvary" of Luke was translated into the Aramaic word "Golgotha." No place of a skull, or any locality which could be called such, existed near Jerusalem or any exclusive Jewish city in Palestine.

"For as yet they knew not the scripture, that he must rise again from the dead" (xx, 9) is contradicted by eight earlier quotations in the synoptics. Mary Magdalene supposes Jesus to be the gardener (xx, 15), who must have received clothes from friends, or was he a spirit, as Renan would explain the apparition? "Being the first day of the week" (xx, 19); that "Sunday evening" was the beginning of the second day of the week.

If Jew-Christians had written the New Testament, there would be a small trace of evidence, but as it was all written by Greeks, the New Testament is incredible.

If Jesus came through closed doors, then he was a spirit and the gospel is a ghost story.

In the Gospel of John we have no childhood of Jesus, no temptation, no twelve apostles; no destruction of the world and second coming; no ascension, no demons, no transfiguration, no cursing of a fig-tree, no Sermon on the Mount, and no preaching of whimsical parables. The twenty-first chapter of John is spurious. The synoptics are certain that Jesus disappeared forever on the third day after his crucifixion. The chapter contains the inspired exclamation by Simon Peter: "I go a-fishing." Jesus says to Peter three times: "Feed my lambs! Feed my sheep," but a fisherman is not supposed to know much about the care of ruminating animals. Chapter xxi is Petrine; it was manufactured at Rome and has no place in a Johannine gospel.

There never appeared a new religion all of a sudden; it was always a forming and gradual blending of old religions into a new one. In this case it was the absorbing of Mithraism into Judaism that formed Christianity. Jesus was one of many, who, after reading Psalms, Isaiah, Zechariah, Daniel, Job and other imitations of Persian poetry, proclaimed themselves the sons of God, the messiahs, in order to save the world, but in reality to die a horrible death.

The Christian belief is a house of cards. One tenet of practical ethics is worth more than all unproven dogmas. The Bible is a book fit only for dark ages and stands in the way of our natural progress toward contentment, true education, liberty without ignorance and peace without fear.

Paine-Ingersoll Banquet in Chicago.

When last heard from, Secretary Reichwald of the American Secular Union was issuing tickets for the Ingersoll-Paine banquet in Chicago's finest meeting-place, the Auditorium, January 30. The official notice of the event follows: "The American Secular Union and Freethought Federation and the Chicago Rationalist Association will hold a banquet in honor of Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll, at the Auditorium Hotel, Chicago, on Jan. 30, at 7 P. M. Some of the leading Freethought speakers in the country have promised to be present and deliver addresses. All friends of Paine and Ingersoll are invited to attend. Mr. E. C. Wentworth will be toastmaster, and we shall have with us Dr. John Emerson Roberts, Clarence S. Darrow, H. Percy Ward, Horace J. Bridges, John E. Remsburg, W. F. McGee, Dr. Lucy Waite, and others."

It is much easier to meet with error than to find truth; error is on the service, and can be more easily met with; truth is hid in great depths, and the way to seek does not appear to all the world.—Goethe.

A VOICE FROM THE SENATE.

Mr. Works of California Warns the Country Against Religion in Politics.

(On January 5 Senator John D. Works, being, as he said, soon to turn back to the people of California the trust they had imposed upon him as a member of the United States Senate, delivered an address upon certain "downward tendencies" of government and citizenship. One section of the speech was entitled "Religion in Politics," under which heading he said:)

Mr. President, absolute and complete separation of church and state is one of the fundamental principles of our government. Freedom of religious beliefs and practices is protected by the Constitution. Congress is expressly forbidden to legislate "respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." It is just as necessary that government and all civic affairs should be kept free from religious or church influence or control as that freedom of religious belief and exercise should be sacredly preserved and protected. It is one of the threatening evils of the times that this important fact is not recognized or the principle that church and state shall be kept separate observed. As a natural and inevitable consequence we are threatened with a religio-political war, the tendency of which is to disturb the harmony of our civic institutions and the disruption and final overthrow of our free institutions and the destruction of the salutary principle of religious freedom.

In times past and even down to the present time in greater or less degree, in other countries, the church has exercised itself not in its religion alone, which is protected by our Constitution, but in secular affairs as well. The power of religious organizations over civic and governmental affairs in some of those countries has been greatly curtailed in later times and their influence more nearly confined to their legitimate powers and functions as religious organizations. As a result it is seen, with no little apprehension, that this great power, either through organization or membership, is exerting every effort to extend its influence in this country in secular affairs, evidenced by the strenuous and to a great extent successful efforts to secure appointments to office and places of power and influence in secular and governmental affairs in the interest of religion. The American people should not look with tolerance upon this effort through religious and church influence to secure places that may in time give over to any religious body the control of civic affairs over which no church or religious body should as such have any influence or control.

Mr. President, what I have said is not inspired by any antagonism toward any particular church, its religion, or any of its members. My opposition to the influence of religion in politics is applicable to every church or religious body. No church, whatever its religious teachings, can be allowed to control over civic or governmental affairs. No citizen, however worthy, should be elevated to any official position because of his religious beliefs or opinions or in the interest of his church or its religious beliefs or practices. Neither should he be debarred from holding office or participating in public affairs because of his religious beliefs. His rights, his duties, and his obligations, both as a citizen of this Republic and as one of its officers, should be wholly apart from and kept separate from his religious beliefs and his duties and obligations to his church, should there be any conflict between the two. His duty as a public official is to his country and not to his religion or his church.

The wisdom of this separation of church and state is fully attested by the history and experience of other countries. The most bloody and cruel wars of all history have been between religious bodies growing out of their control over the affairs of government. The intolerance and fanatical cruelty of religious bodies has been a disgrace to Christianity and to civilization. We want none of it in this country. Any attempt at church or religious influence or control over the political or governmental affairs must be condemned and crushed in the beginning if religious freedom and civic rights are to be protected and preserved. The unwise activities of church and religious influence in politics have aroused serious animosities and antagonism resulting in the organization of a secret society or association, the object of which is to antagonize and defeat any and every candidate for office supported by such influences. It is this political conflict between religious influence and a secret opposing organization that gives cause for great concern. Both religious and such secret organizations, so far as they deal in politics on any such grounds, are seriously in the wrong. It is just as reprehensible for any class of American citizens to combine or conspire together to defeat the political aspirations of a citizen because of his religion as it is for citizens of his religious faith to support him because of his religious beliefs, thus bringing religion into politics. It raises a false issue. It is un-American. It is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. Any religious organization that presents any such issue invites a religious controversy in secular and civic affairs that may result in the most serious consequences. It has been made a direct issue in elections in some of the states already and has defeated some candidates for office. It has entered into this body and may, if the conflict continues, change its complexion. It is an evil that unless speedily exposed and patriotically suppressed, will grow and spread. It should be the duty of every American citizen, whatever his religious beliefs, and every religious organization of whatever faith, to set face against every effort or tendency to bring religion into politics or make the religious faith of any citizen a test of his right or fitness for public office.

Truth.

A SONNET.

As mists in summer fade before the morn
When rays of golden sunlight pierce the gloom,
So Falsehood dies to perish in the tomb,
When royal Truth reveals her glorious dawn;
When Reason's light, long hidden, is reborn
To strengthen Hope, and all man's life illumine;
Till from the vantage ground of error's doom,
Men learn to love the Truth, and Falsehood scorn,
O Harbinger of freedom, joy and peace!
How gladly shall we hail thy dawning day,
When trusting hearts shall find in thee release
From saddening doubt and wearying dismay;
And may thy gracious guidance never cease,
Inspiring men to glory in thy sway.

A Note from an Author.

"PSYCHOLOGICAL LABORATORY

BRYN MAWR COLLEGE

"BRYN MAWR, PA., Jan. 14, 1917.

"EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER—Dear Sir: I noticed in your issue of Jan. 13 an article entitled 'Unbelieving Men of Science,' in which you report, following the Public Ledger, an investigation I have carried out. I was glad that you thought the facts worth publishing. They are to my mind of great significance, and I wish you could have had access to my book, 'The Belief in God and Immortality; a Psychological, Anthropological, and Statistical Study,' published by Sherman, French & Co., Boston. You would have seen, among other things, that I have investigated also students' beliefs, and that there is a chapter in which I answer the question you say I do not answer ('Why the greater men should be more skeptical than the lesser, the professor does not attempt to explain.') That chapter is the tenth, pp. 282-290.

"May I venture the suggestion that Part III. of my book would interest your readers as much, perhaps, as the statistical part (Part II.). It is entitled 'On the Present Utility of the Beliefs in Personal Immortality and in a Personal God.' It provides facts of many classes pointing to the enormous overvaluation of these beliefs, and suggests a substitute for them. Very sincerely yours,

"JAMES H. LEUBA."

Our comments on Professor Leuba's invaluable book were perforce based on a review found elsewhere, because his publishers had neglected to send us a press copy of it. Having since obtained one through the courtesy of Messrs. Sherman, French & Co., we find it better than we expected. A number of books and uncounted sermons have been devoted in this country and in England to a demonstration that religion and science are in perfect harmony and that men of science and ministers of the gospel agree as to the fundamental truths of Christianity. Professor Leuba, before writing his book, took the trouble to inquire whether this is so. He found that among the many hundreds of physical and biological scientists, historians, sociologists and psychologists with whom he corresponded, especially among those of the first class in their profession, not more than one-half went so far toward indorsing the Christian religion as to believe in God and immortality. His findings are authoritative and conclusive. We shall do what we can to give circulation to his book. The price is $2, and it may be ordered through the Truth Seeker Company.

Pittsburgh Paine Banquet.

The annual banquet in honor of Thomas Paine will be held by the Pittsburgh Rationalist Society Friday evening, January 26, at 7 o'clock, in the German Club, 222 Craft avenue.

Rabbi J. Leonard Levy will be the principal speaker, and will speak on "Thomas Paine, Apostle of Liberty." Marshall J. Gauvin and others will also make addresses, and a fine musical program is being provided. George Siebel, corresponding secretary of the Paine National Historical Society, will act as toastmaster of the Pittsburgh banquet, and will be in New York on January 29, to attend a private dinner in honor of the author-hero of the American Revolution.

NOTES AT LARGE.

If the courts have cleared their calendars of all legitimately cognizable cases under the law, and have no business before them except some of the contemptibly mean and petty prosecutions that now engage their attention, they should adjourn indefinitely, or until something turns up of sufficient importance to justify them in reconvening.

With no apparent appreciation of what is the actual function of justice, the courts of the state of Washington lately wasted a good deal of time, and incidentally overthrew the principle of free speech, in trying and convicting a Socialist named Paul Haffer for stating in public some well-known facts regarding George Washington. The judges and prosecutors in that case ought to be sent to a woman's school and put in short trousers until they grow intellectually to the stature of men who know something.

In New York last week the Rev. Bouck White, a preacher of so-called social revolution, who takes Jesus as his personal model, teacher and savior, was indicted with a number of his followers for illustrating his ideas of internationalism and universal brotherhood by putting a lot of flags, including that of the United States, in a melting-pot together. It seems to us that only an idle tribunal with no excuse for sitting, would take notice of a thing like that.

Another New York case that ought to be relegated to the women's clubs and doctors' clinics is that of Mrs. Margaret Sanger, who is on trial for giving information to wives regarding the limitation of their families; while in Cleveland, Ohio, a jury has just deliberated thirteen hours and then found Ben Reitman "guilty" of distributing birth-control literature, and he has been sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000 and serve six months in the workhouse.

This is humiliating to any thoughtful citizens who would like to retain a little respect for the government, the courts and our system of administering justice.

The Supreme Court at Washington does not rise above the rest, having just confirmed a conviction under the so-called white slave act of a couple of young fellows in California who crossed the state line with two girls to whom they were not married. Is that what we have a Supreme Court and grave and reverend judges for?

Lastly, for the present, we may recur to the blasphemy trial pending in Connecticut, where the liberty of Michael Mockus is in jeopardy because he made fun of the Bible and its savage and absurd conceptions of an overruling deity.

We do not see how the prosecutors and judges in these paltry persecutions can contemplate themselves and their littleness without losing all self-respect. Have they no intellectual resources and diversions that can broaden the scope of their stunted minds so they may see and know what trumpery stuff the law becomes as they interpret and enforce it? What has caused that degeneration of their characters so that they will stoop, in their official capacity, to acts involving a mean prudery they would be ashamed to be suspected of in private life? Cannot the law be administered without forcing lawyers and judges to do things which as gentlemen they would scorn and condemn?

Possibly governments and courts have been organized as a vehicle for the expression of those meannesses in human nature which have to be repressed in private and business relations with other members of the community in order to retain their tolerance and respect. Such a view is strengthened by the foregoing examples; but it is not a very noble use or conception of the functions of our legal institutions.

Among the critics of the gutter evangelist are some who come back at him in his own style. These are effective with persons of the same class as those found among trail-hitters, but scarcely so with the social supporters of evangelism who think that perhaps some good may be done even at the expense of culture. To the latter we would recommend the well-considered observations of Mr. Winston Churchill, the author and friend of President Wilson, and at whose country home in New Hampshire the latter has been a guest. Mr. Churchill was speaking in King's chapel, Boston, January 8. Said he:

"We often hear it said today this is a religious age. It is an age of discontent, an age of mental and moral and social confusion, and when we seek to arrive at some degree of clear-mindedness, it becomes plain that these are all due to a religious confusion, but it is becoming clearer and clearer that the salvation of man depends wholly upon his intellect. We know nothing about God except what we have learned for ourselves. He has given us the mechanism, the potentiality of salvation in our intellect.

"The corner-stone of democracy is education. The religious citizen of democracy is he who is wise from rich experience and attains the full psychological life of knowledge. If we are to progress we must have a culture of democracy. Democracy seeks its perfection in progress, not in arrested achievement.

"It is difficult to imagine a Huxley or a Pasteur, for instance, getting religion from an itinerant evangelist. And the Huxleys and Pasteurs are precisely the models we demand for democratic citizenship. The success of our democracy is dependent upon the transformation of the individual into a social creature, not by supernatural sanctions and taboos, a fear of hellfire or materialistic reward in a life hereafter, but by the acquisition of knowledge.

"The projection of orthodox evangelism into an age when knowledge and science are the vital factors of progress is mischievous in its effects, for it leads to muddle-headedness, to a clouding of the true objects of our civilization.

"Revivalism, unless it actually produces in its converts a frame of mind compatible with the higher morality, unless it leads them into some useful task for the betterment of society, is pure sentimentalism, emotionalism. It has the orgiastic effect of winding up its converts like so many toy locomotives and leaving them to thresh out their energy upside down on the floor. It supplies them no tracks to run on.

"Evangelism brings gospel down to the masses, instead of bringing the masses up to the gospel. In other words, it emphasizes and lays stress on all the superstitious and supernatural elements of a religion that belongs to an era when humanity was still in its swaddling clothes. If the orthodox evangelist were taken literally, and his doctrine generally adopted, it would mean a return to medievalism."

There is enough criticism of this kind, from men of light and leading, to show that the intellect of the century is in the right place. The evangelist may have the support of the clerical profession which profits by the craze he excites, and of the industrial exploiters whose employees he convinces that the only foe of their well-being is ungodliness and beer. The ignorantly pious, who mistake their own emotions for the operation of the "holy spirit," will also approve of his work. We know, however, of no informed person whose opinion is above suspicion of being influenced by the wish to share a little reflected notoriety who regards the tabernacle services as being on a plane above a theatrical variety show. Many think them beneath a good circus for entertainment and more injurious to those who attend. They represent the drunkenness of the gospel, not better than that of the gutter.

The late performances of Harry K. Thaw, murderer, pervert and degenerate, caused the following dispatch from Pittsburgh, Pa., to appear in the New York Times:

"This city was stirred tonight (Jan. 9) by the news that Harry K. Thaw was in trouble again, for he had been so active in business and church life here since getting his liberty that his public appearances caused only perfunctory notice. Thaw recently began to take great interest in the affairs of the Third Presbyterian church and the mission maintained by it in the Soho district, where many foreigners are employed in mills and factories.

"The Rev. W. L. McEwan, who performed the ceremony that united Harry Thaw in marriage with Evelyn Nesbit, and also that of Alice Thaw and the Earl of Yarmouth, has established the mission and put his assistant, the Rev. John Fisher, in charge. Harry K. Thaw has paid a great deal of attention to this work, and on a recent visit there contributed liberally to the mission's support."

When a man of means "takes great interest" in religious affairs and has "contributed liberally to the mission's support," he is described, according to the best traditions, as a pillar of the church; and such is Harry K. Thaw. That he should have taken deep interest also in the work of the late Anthony Comstock only clinches the title. The uniting in Thaw of depravity and devotion does not exactly prove the thesis of Theodore Schroeder that perversion and piety belong to the same psychological family, but it certainly supports the contention that these professions and practices are wholly reconcilable with each other.

The combination of theological belief and immorality is strikingly illustrated by the beautiful sculptured frieze over the door of the Royal Exchange in London, bearing this legend: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." One can understand the sensation which we should experience here in America at seeing that declaration above the door of the New York Stock Exchange or Board of Trade; but they have become so accustomed to it in London that they are not shocked at the incongruity between the practice and the faith. Perhaps an even more flagrant example of this contradiction is found in the capitol building at Harrisburg, where, in the House of Representatives, as one looks beyond the great candelabra—purchased by the pound at extravagant figures—to the sumptuously embossed gallery—contracted by the yard and equally extravagant—one sees in raised letters: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Objection is again being raised against the removal of the familiar motto "In God we trust" from some American coins. Ministers who have never felt responsibility for unholy traffic carried on by these tokens, demand the continuance of the hypocritical legend. Trifling with the symbols and words of religion by professedly religious people, and toying with sacred things, is a sadder commentary on our times than any evidence of godless morality.

"On life's highway," writes John E. Remsburg, dating his letter at Potter, Kansas, Jan. 7, 1917, "I am starting to-day toward the seventieth milestone. Shall I reach it? To all except a few relatives and friends it will matter but little whether I do or not." Mark the modest man. Here is one whose writings have enlightened and instructed hundreds and thousands of minds; whose name is known to tens of thousands as that of an author and teacher; whose face during his lifetime has been looked upon by a million; in whose longevity and well-being a multitude feel a personal and affectionate interest; and he thinks that only a few relatives and friends will care whether he ever reaches the seventieth milestone or not! Here for the first time Mr. Remsburg speaks unconvincingly, and his thought does not correspond with reality. No one who knows him would be reconciled to his demise for the next twenty years, and they would then accept the decree of nature with more regret than resignation; for they know they shall not look upon his like again.

It does not escape our attention that Col. W. F. Cody, that good old scout, died a Christian without knowing it. The Omaha Bee of January 12 states that on the night before he died, Buffalo Bill was baptized into the Roman Catholic church. "Colonel Cody was unconscious," we are told, "when the baptism took place, and no attempt was made to arouse him." So he died a Catholic. On the strength of a similar piece of farcical mummery General Grant was made to die a Methodist. When the general was supposed to be dying, Parson Newman was called in without the patient's solicitation, and a sprinkling took place. Such proceedings are adopted for the advertising they give the clericals. Not even the Methodist minister nor the Catholic priest would have the face to affirm that, consistently with the faith, baptizing an unconscious man, or a man who has not made any profession of belief, is of the slightest theological value. With those not awed by pious claptrap, or impressed by the magic of the medicine-man, contempt for religion is increased by such performances.

One might suppose that genuine belief in a future life better than this, would reconcile people to death. Yet the devoutest believers in immortality, whose life in this world is the best guarantee of happiness in the next, and who lustily sing, "Filled with delight, my raptured soul would here no longer stay," and other hymns expressive of their desire to leave at once this carnal world, still cling with a marvelous tenacity to this life. This is a striking proof of the incongruity between the Christian's belief and his personal human feeling. It also illustrates the doubtful character of Christian teaching; for if this came to man with the assurance of fact, he would find it an easy and agreeable task to plan his life in accordance with his creed. Superstition beckons him to another world, but Natural Reason counsels a happy residence here; and thus the age-long warfare continues.

The question is frequently raised whether teaching or superintending of Sunday schools does not afford men opportunities not otherwise enjoyed for leading girls astray. B. F. Rudolph was Sunday-school superintendent in Connellsville, Pa., and raised his son to be a minister. Rudolph committed "serious offenses" against several young girls (eleven is the number who complained), and then after conviction and sentence to from one to five years in the penitentiary, and while awaiting a new trial, he fled to Cuba, South America and Chicago with "a young and beautiful woman." It is the relation of this man to the Sunday school and the ministry that makes his case interesting to the observer of moral and religious manifestations.

Formed on the good old plan,
A true, and brave, and downright honest man!
He blew no trumpet in the market-place,
Nor in the church, with hypocrite face,
Supplied with cant the lack of Christian grace;
Loathing pretense, he did with cheerful will What others talked of, while their hands were still.
—Whittier.

DECEMBER MEETINGS OF THE LOS ANGELES RATIONALISTS.

From John A. Morris, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

During December, 1916, Charles T. Sprading spoke upon the following subjects before the Los Angeles, Cal., Liberal Club: "A Rationalist's View of War," "Were the Founders of Religions Paranoiacs?" "Robert G. Ingersoll," "Why Christmas? Is It Pagan or Christian?"

All these lectures were good, but one discourse, Dec. 10, was rather new on many points, as Sprading showed that the founders of religions, Krishna, Buddha, Christ, etc., came up to Dr. Hirsch's interpretation of the term paranoia as given in his justly authoritative and informative volume, "Religion and Civilization." Mr. Sprading told the audience that all the phenomena of clairvoyance, clairaudience, etc., as so much evidenced in modern Spiritualism among the mediums thereof, was but a phase of paranoia; and the more divinely inspired they felt themselves to be, the more paranoiac they were. In my investigations of Spiritualism during the last twenty years or more I find three groups: first, rank frauds; second, sincere and honest paranoiacs, through whom the phenomena are genuine, but the mediums are paranoiac in character; and lastly, those whom I call phenomenon-chasers, which constitute the vast mass of Spiritualism.

The lecturer also spoke of some of the big men of the Bible, such as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Moses and Aaron, who were paranoiacally inclined and afflicted with the idea that they were particularly favored by Jehovah because of their dreams, such visions and grotesque imageries giving to them notions of grandeur which is one of the symptoms of paranoia, the absolutely divine and uncoprightable conditions of a paranoiac.

In the short time in which Mr. Sprading spoke he was unable justly to diagnose such modern paranoiacs as Martin Luther, John and Charles Wesley, Joan of Arc, Joe Smith, the Mormon, Emanuel Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, Mary Baker Eddy, Madam Blavatsky, John Alexander Dowie, etc. He did tell us, however, of how John Alexander Dowie once landed in New York and accepted that city, with all its wealth and culture, its wickedness and woe, in the name of the "Great I Am," John Dowie himself. Opening wide his arms, he shouted with the fervency and power "Billy" Sunday himself could not beat, "O New York, thou art mine!" only New York gave him the hoarse horse laugh, and it no more became the possession of this Jesus-tempered Dowie than it did the real estate property of poor B. Fake Mills or "Billy" Sunday, whose oyster New York has not yet become. New York has a hoarse laugh of derision for all these paranoiacs that breaks their hearts and sends them cursing in their madness back to their visions of grandeur and persecution, because, forsooth, this city of their desire will not accept their revelations from on high. New York takes its modern saviors as the Charlie Chaplins of religious clowning, and although some of these paranoiacs get a fat swag of plunder into their purse through their prayer and praise meetings there, it is because New York is willing to pay big for its amusements, though not much for its philosophies.

Dec. 17 was Ingersoll night, and as the best part of Mr. Sprading's speech was printed next day in the Los Angeles Examiner, allow me here to quote it as a part of my report:

Ingersoll was a great champion of liberty. It was always on his lips. He was ever ready to grant it to others, and this is the real test of a Libertarian. It is not enough to wish liberty for yourself, but to want it for others as well. He had the true theory of liberty. He said: "The more liberty you give, the more you have." And he saw as but few did the importance of liberty in the affairs of mankind.

Next to liberty he believed science to be of the greatest importance. He never tired of praising the great scientists and telling us of the benefit science had been to the human race. He tells us: "Science is the only civilizer. It has freed the slave, clothed the naked, fed the hungry, lengthened life, given us homes and hearths, pictures and books, ships and railways, telegraphs and cables, engines that tirelessly turn the countless wheels, and it has destroyed the monsters, phantoms, the winged horrors that filled the savage brain."

When Ingersoll commenced his work, Sunday was a terrible day. No amusements were allowed; miserable things were taught by miserable beings; pleasure was a crime, to these fanatics; to be miserable was to be pious, to be joyous was to be devilish. Ingersoll helped to change all this; he lived to see Sunday turned into a day of some pleasure, a day of picnics, baseball, theaters, etc.

Ingersoll was an Agnostic. He did not pretend to know whether there was another life or not. He knew that others knew as little as he did about it, but he did know that the beliefs in another life came from other sources than the Christian religion. It has often been said by Christians that immortality is the only consolation. But Ingersoll has shown us that eternal rest is a beautiful thing and a great consolation. "Upon the shadowy shore of death," said he, in his inimitable imagery, "the sea of trouble casts no wave. Eyes that have been curtained by the everlasting dark will never know again the burning touch of tears."

Wherever liberty was being trampled underfoot there poured forth from his matchless eloquence a protest that often defeated the purpose of tyrannical persons and movements. Poverty and misery always caused his great heart to throb with sympathy, and his hand and tongue were every busy to relieve. So he belonged to every good movement; he was a part of everything that made for progress. He belonged to no party, no sect. He belonged to the whole world.

On Dec. 24 Sprading "preached" his Christmas sermon, and on Dec. 25 the Examiner again published a synopsis of his address, the only fault being that it did not publish enough of it, these paragraphs being omitted:

Christ is a sun-god. Listen to a description of him by his apostles. John says he is "the light of the world." That is not true of a man, but is true of the sun. Again, John says he is come "a light into the world, that whosoever believeth in him should not abide in darkness." Luke tells us that he is "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory (or brightness) of his people." John says he "is light, and in him no darkness is." All of which is a correct description of the sun of nature, but not of the son of man.

If we lived far enough north so that the sun dipped beneath the horizon for three days and three nights, as it did to these primitive people, we, too, would rejoice at its return more than we do in sunny Southern California. So let us join with the pagan and Christian sun-worshippers in rejoicing that the sun is coming, not going, that it will light and warm the world into new life; and in hoping that it will soon shine as the sun of peace on Christian Europe.

Of course, what the newspaper reported was all right and we must accept small favors, even though soliciting big ones; for this is the first time there has ever been a synopsis of a Liberal lecture given in any of the daily papers of Los Angeles Monday mornings, to the best of my knowledge and belief. This has occurred twice, and so Mr. Sprading is in the midst of the preachers on the religious page of the Examiner Monday mornings.

Watch the Los Angeles Rationalists for 1917!

A NEW RELIGION.

From Atwood Manville, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Two recent letters to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER are interesting on account of the view expressed that Freethought will accomplish little until it builds a new foundation instead of merely destroying false doctrines. Mr. Eshleman provides the incentive for this article, but again fails to describe the new religion that he constantly refers to, and might be interested in the religion of Progressivism outlined in the "Hundredth Wave."

As we understand it, Rationalism is the system of thought advocated by THE TRUTH SEEKER to supplant all religions, and is built on the foundation of reason laid by Freethought after demolishing the old religious structures. As the word "religion" has always stood for the relation of man to the supernatural, and as true evidence of such relation is still lacking, it is better not to call the new ideal by a name that implies an old faith in God, but to advocate more thorough study of the proper relations of man to man.

The churches are realizing the modern trend toward social service, and endeavor to relegate to the background all discussions of theology while claiming for Christianity the best methods of serving humanity. They are handicapped by their conservatism and cannot readily adopt progressive ideas as the Freethinker can; so Humanism gains its recruits primarily from the thinkers and is copied by the churches in self-defense.

The truth about the relation of man to man is the ideal of the new system that is to supplant religion. We are concerned not only with learning the laws of nature, but in overcoming nature when such process will make man's life on earth more satisfactory. We must take thought for the morrow and strive for "the greatest good for the greatest number," with a realization that things are not right and true merely because they have existed for centuries, but may for that very reason belong to a past stage in our evolution. If our effort is directed to constructive work along humanitarian lines rather than solely to destructive criticism, we may broaden our field and increase our influence for good.

Freethinkers claim that they are more reasonable than Christians because they follow in conduct true laws instead of being bound by false doctrines and the antiquated morality of two thousand years ago; but we must do something to prove that claim to the world. Many of the humanitarian charities and progressive benefactions are supported by Freethinkers, but usually as individuals, so that we receive but little credit. Christians claim all the good, just as they claim Washington and Lincoln. Their organization is superior to anything that Rationalists can even hope for in the near future, and it is difficult to effect any lasting fraternity without having the influential and moneyed men of the community interested. Although less than 40,000,000 people in the United States are church members, seventy per cent. of the population is allied to the churches rather than to Rationalism, and this large majority controls the means of disseminating thought to a great extent.

Humanism in its proper sense is the true thought for today and for the future, and it will be interesting to consider the means for its accomplishment. Street speaking reaches a few; books and pamphlets influence more, but these are not doing the most for our "new religion." They are for the spread of the excellent cause of Freethought, but that is not identical with Humanism. One is the stepping stone to the other. One removes the mental debris and clears the mind for the reception of the higher ideal. One sets us free and the other shows us what to do with our freedom. Scientific treatises advance our cause, but are too learned for most of us. The novels like "Robert Elsmere," "The Inside of the Cup" and "The Brook Kerith" probably bring to many orthodox people their first idea of the possibility of doubt on religious matters; but the great agencies of Humanism are the daily papers. They occasionally approximate the truth about the relations of man to man, man to woman, and both to society, and advance the cause of humanity more than the Bible or other sacred writings. They are, however, more interested in news than in facts, more concerned with making money and coloring events to suit their patrons than in progress.

The muck-raking magazines are said to be the only popular publications not venable, but their enthusiasm is short-lived and they soon revert to frivolities. There may be many other better propaganda for the cause of Humanism, but they all have one great failing; they are afraid to attack religion; to destroy the tradition of a supernatural control over all the sparrows; to admit openly that man makes wars and peace, marriages and divorces, without any divine commands or interference.

This is where THE TRUTH SEEKER is superior to all the others as a medium for the promulgation of the great new truths. It is afraid of no subject. It fears no hell; no popular opinion; nothing but the laws of the state. But even a free periodical must retain the support of its subscribers in order to appear periodically, so it is not probable that the suggestion made herein will be adopted unless a considerable number of readers express their satisfaction.

It may be impertinent for the present writer, a recent recruit, to suggest that Freethinkers are in danger of being bound to past traditions in the same manner as religious people, and that a search for the truth among such modern ideas as hygiene, pacifism, universal suffrage, labor questions, poverty and riches, singletax, internationalism, marriage and divorce, etc., is of even greater importance than the destruction of religion, false though it be. THE TRUTH SEEKER has attacked the Bible, Jesus Christ and religion from every possible angle for forty-three years and is in danger of becoming as stereotyped as the Bible itself. Its name implies a search for the truth, and if that search is extended to any subject that tends to further the true idea of Humanism it is a step towards constructive morality and might commend the paper to a much larger number of readers than at present. The present economic department is among the least prominent sections of the paper, and the suggestion is to have the leading article each week an exposition of radical, or at least modern, views on such topics as those previously mentioned. They could not, of course, all be original, but would represent the best that has been written recently on the secular themes that we trust will supplant theology. This would not usurp the place of the interesting Freethought news, and nine-tenths of the paper would still be conducted as at present while the tone of the first article, and consequently of the paper itself, would become constructive rather than destructive, progressive rather than anti-religious. Perhaps some one will start with a good article on Humanism.

THE MOCKUS CASE.

From Norman Murray, Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It is to be hoped that the "Mockus Case" will convince free and easy Freethinkers that we have not really made as much progress as many people imagined. Some time ago, at a public discussion on the subject of religion, the lecturer in answering my remarks said that I was lashing a dead horse in worrying myself and others about Moses and persecutions, as persecutions were a thing of the past. Yet this very same lecturer professed to believe in Christianity. Later the professor of Moral Philosophy at McGill University lectured on Balfour's "Theism and Humanism."

I was invited to take part in the discussion. I wanted to know which of the gods we were to adopt if we decided that Theism made for Humanism. Why should we select the Hebrew God, who in my opinion was the worst type in the whole long list of gods, in preference to any other? He did not answer. In private conversation afterwards the professor advised me to be a liberal Christian. Now I maintain without the least fear of contradiction that there never was, that there is not now, and that there cannot be such a thing as a consistent, liberal Christian.

No church creed or catechism admits that any pagan or heathen philosophy answers as a substitute for Christianity. As long as the Bible or the Koran is believed or taught to the rising generation there can never be any guarantee of the continuance of liberty. The Bible is the paper God of all believing Protestants, and until mankind has the courage to tear it to pieces literally and otherwise as I did once in a Montreal courthouse, all talk of our liberties being safe is pure moonshine.

Some years ago I was asked by certain very self-conceited wise people what was the secret of my fighting propaganda. I answered, "The only way to keep fanatics in their own place is to make more trouble for them than they can make for you." The great philosopher, David Hume, was dead and buried twenty years before the boy, Thomas Aikenhead, was hanged in Presbyterian Edinburgh for calling the Bible "Ezra's Fables." David Hume made much more trouble for the churches and made thousands doubt the truth of Christianity for everyone that ever heard of Thomas Aikenhead. David Hume died peacefully in his bed, but the boy Aikenhead was hanged. Why? Because David Hume was too big a man for the bigots of Edinburgh to handle.

I presume Robert G. Ingersoll lectured in Connecticut, but he was not put on trial for blasphemy? Why? Because he was too big for the cowards. They pounce on a little-known foreigner. Now there are enough Freethinkers in the English-speaking world to make the bigots of Connecticut sorry that they ever meddled with this man.

I suggest that all our Freethought societies take the matter up, devote a special meeting to the discussion of the subject, and subscribe to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

LYMAN ABBOTT'S THEOLOGY.

From Aurora Thunder, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Your quotation from Dr. Lyman Abbott instances how very shallow is the reasoning of men bearing high-sounding vouchers of intelligence from mere theological colleges.

He says: "I had supposed that the doctrine which limits the love of God to a portion of the human race, as to the Jews . . . had pretty much disappeared from at least all of the Protestant churches."

He further says: "For sixty years I have been studying the Bible," so he ought to know something of it.

Now I ask Dr. Abbott where in the whole of the Old Testament, which, unauthentic at best, purports to be nothing but a history of the one "peculiar" and "chosen people," the Jews and their specially invented, recorded and patented Jehovah God and his works, whose principal business as recorded seems to have been special favors to the Jews, and the wanton destruction of all other nations "created" by him, vouched for by the frequently reiterated special orders of "Thus saith the Lord, go smite, etc."—where, I ask, does he discover in the "general teaching of the Bible" the "universal fatherhood of God"?

The Christ of the remainder of the Bible is maintained to be the son (old as his father), part of and co-equal with this same Jehovah of the Old Testament who indeed claimed, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

Where, then, does this titled student from his "sixty years' study of the Bible" find his authority for saying, "Into us all he (Jehovah) has breathed the breath of his own life . . . speaking in us though his voice is not recognized," and that "the universal fatherhood of God is confirmed by the universal instinct of humanity"?

By the assertion, "Into us all he breathed his own life, speaking in us," Dr. Abbott must admit the absurd paradox that the voice of the Atheist and Agnostic must, too, in that case be the voice of Jehovah.

I maintain that the "universal fatherhood of (this Bible) God" of which he speaks is not "confirmed by the universal instinct of humanity," but is accepted only by a very small minority of the world's inhabitants. The rational white superman of today and past ages has never accepted this God, or his fatherhood, even under the applied force and tyranny of combined church and civil powers.

O Doctors of Divinity! (what a title for a human animal!) you are persistent but funny creatures. You still cling in these days of enlightenment to the childish teaching of the breathing into a lump of clay (with "nostrils," but without organs of circulation, or brains, or intestines), "the breath of life which became a living soul." That these souls wander from one body to another, yet each soul must give an individual account of itself at some future time! That your God actually "breathed into us all" a part of his eternal divinity, to be doomed in millions of instances to the home of devils—eternal hell! This is what such Christian philosophers bring their own God to!

Go to, Doctor. Why the foolish story of a special creation out of clay in the image of God, when this special design differs not in one single iota from the preceding animal of natural evolution?

It surely takes some learning if sixty years' study can do no better than this!

Mr. J. R. Perry's Spiritualism is of the same brand. Mixed up with material wooden instruments, tables, fiddles, etc., "a man weighing 140 pounds was drawn up and floated over the heads of the party—floated out of the window at the risk of his life (to what purpose?), and landed safely into the arms of a sub-committee awaiting his arrival in an adjoining room, pointing directly to an unseen, intelligent use of forces." Yes, and pointing just as surely to a premeditated though unseen use of forces such as possibly a block and tackle with invisible wires on the roof or story above, which "floated him out of the window and landed him safely into the waiting (confederate) sub-committee's arms"!

And all these purely materialistic and nonsensical antics are performed by "souls"—parts of a living eternal God breathed into man, who must ultimately give an individual account of himself!

Did it ever occur to Mr. Perry that he was born nude? That material nature recognizes but the nude of man, much less could the soul or spirit be otherwise than nude, unless they have the same old story over again in the spirit world—gold mines and miners, workers in fiddles and harps, linen and drapery factories, and then some material workers to help them—for his highest authority distinctly asserts, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones"—nor ears to ear, as one Bible edition had it!

Yet these men dub themselves D. D.'s and thinkers.

Did one ever yet, in these prudish religious days, hear of a nude spirit, or see the picture of one?

Tell us some more funny stories.

O good old heretical friend Shakespeare, I am still listening to you. "What fools these mortals be."

RELIGIOUS IMPOSTORS.

From E. E. Kusel, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

President Weatherby of the Columbus (Ohio) Rationalist Society (T. S., Dec. 30) says that he finds a few persons are inclined to impute to all religionists dishonest purposes and selfish motives; and others have advised that we deal gently with those who profess to believe in the "holy" Bible. I uphold scoring all religious fanatics thoroughly; not personally, but I find satisfaction and much pleasure in using severity with all religious sects. There's a reason, and it is this: I contend from experience of my early associations with pious people that not one, no not one, has faith in that old farcical book called the "Word of God"; therefore, from my manner of reasoning, all zealous bibliomaniacs are deserving of a tremendous jolt. Do the mild and careful writers find fault with a treatise that forcefully condemns such modern fakers as the "Rev." Mr. Sunday? Do they think it too radical to roast the leaders of the religious institutions which are making muttonheads of their adherents? I maintain that if Jesus could call the sanctimonious rabble a generation of vipers and kick over the tables and lash the money changers (or as St. Paul referred to the professors of religion in Romans 1, 2 and 3), there is no harm in anyone else stating the truth against the host of numbskulls and credulous imbeciles.

In the several religious papers which I have before me I find the veriest rot. I meet devout members of the sects which these papers represent, and I find them dreamers and pharisees who really do not believe the stupefying stuff culled from the gospels. Sometimes I am tempted to allow leniency for the Bible "believers," because most of them are incipiently insane or professional assinine bipeds.

I do not attack a man for believing in a life after death, but I surely do criticize the hypocritical pietist and his literature when I positively know from experience and reason that such are absolutely false. Allow me here to state that James i, 13, upsets the Lord's Prayer so plainly that no one but a sophist or a Pauline liar would attempt to "spiritually interpret" that contradiction.

Having read the writings of Volney E. Lacy, comparing carefully his comment with the prophecies as to Jesus Christ, I find that not one so-called prophecy in the Old Testament has the remotest reference to the coming of "Our Lord and Savior." Now, in the face of absolute truth taken from their own Bible concerning Jesus, that these prophecies are not at all applicable, shall I merely criticize in mild terms the fraudulency of those pious impostors and grafters who pull the wool over the eyes of the credulous, non-thinking dupes? Not on your life—not me.

HE LOVES THE PAPER.

From D. H. Sislian, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

With my New Year greetings of best wishes for you and your most excellent family in the Truth Seeker office, I send you a five-dollar check for the next two year's subscription. I cannot do without it, I am sure. It is the only paper that contains on its every page the solid and sound nourishment for my brain development. For the masses, I see the bread and butter question is the first and last, and the only one; but for one, I need infinitely more than that, and I can have it in abundance even when I have but little of the material comforts of life.

I must confess that your paper has been supplying me all that superior joy and pleasure of life for the last two years or more, making me forget all the trifling vexations that oppress each of us. The joy of knowledge or truth always brings its seeker this surpassing happiness.

A few years ago I knew nothing of your paper. The first copy that I bought and read captivated my heart, and I am in love with it. I must have it every week as long as I live.

EDWARD BUTLER DEAD.

From Mrs. E. Butler, Missouri.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

My husband, Edward Butler, died Dec. 15, 1916, at the age of 81 years.

He was a member of the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation, and had been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for about forty years. I intend to subscribe for this great Freethought publication as long as I can.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Don't Be Superstitious.

In the year 1913 the 13th day of one of the months (June) fell on Friday. The girl who waited on our table at the restaurant would not come to work that day, but stayed at home to pray. Two 13s and a Friday were a combination that frightened her. We need not say she was ignorant and a Roman Catholic.

Prof. Garrett P. Serviss takes occasion to point out how likely it is that there will be an unusual display of superstition this year because of the fact that many eclipses occur. This, he says, is going to be a remarkable year for those awe-inspiring phenomena. There will be seven eclipses—the greatest number that can possibly occur in any one year—and three of these will be of the moon, the greatest number of lunar eclipses that can occur in one year. One of these, the first total eclipse of the moon that has been since 1913, has already happened, having taken place just one week after New Year's Eve. The next lunar eclipse will occur in the middle of the year, and the third in December. Then there are the four solar eclipses which the year is to witness, although none of them will be total, so that they will lack spectacular features.

A precisely similar combination has not occurred since the year 1787, and will not recur before 1992. In extraordinary eclipse years, when there are seven eclipses in all, it is more usual for five to be solar and only two lunar.

It is hardly necessary to point out what a magnificent opportunity this sublime play of celestial shadows affords for the superstition mongers, who seize every such chance to bring back the clouds that science has partly expelled. For a hundred persons who credulously listen to astrological vaticinations based on aspects and occurrences in the sky, is there one who reflects that all of these phenomena have long since been proved to obey laws as simple and as unconnected with human fates as the rotations of the wheels of a watch?

There are persons who believe that it is unlucky to pass under a ladder leaning over a sidewalk, because somebody has told them so; there are others who for a similar non-reason will not cross a street ahead of a funeral procession; others who carry a horse chestnut to keep off rheumatism; others who are thrown into a shudder if a cross-eyed man happens to look them in the face, or if a snake glides across the road ahead of them! The man who is afraid of the shadow of an eclipse or thinks that it portends either good or evil is on the same intellectual level. Ignorance puts him there; soothsayers would keep him there, but it is his own fault if he remains in that humiliating position.

The moon does not come between the earth and the sun except in the regular performance of her duty, which duty is simply to hold the path that gravitation prescribes for her. She does not pass into the shadow of the earth as a token that wrath and misfortune are about to descend upon any man or nation, but merely because she cannot avoid the shadow which lies across her way.

If eclipses sometimes occur with unusual frequency, it is because the position of the moon in space with reference to the sun and the earth periodically changes in obedience to laws that are well understood by astronomers, as is proved by their ability to predict all eclipses long in advance of their occurrence.

There is nothing mysterious or occult about it. But there is something about it that is immensely interesting. It has all the fascination of a great game, played according to fixed principles, but with certain variations allowed which introduce complications requiring the exercise of sharp attention, close observation, knowledge of the rules, and acute reasoning on the part of the spectators who follow its developments.

We are the spectators, instructed in the rules; the sun, the moon and the earth are the players, bound by regulations that they cannot transgress, but permitted to pull and haul a little for position. Gravitation furnishes the system of ropes by which they hold one another. Swaying shadows are the intangible sticks with which the touches are made in the game of eclipses. The sun masterfully rushes on through the field of space, dragging the others after him.

They swing and oscillate at the end of their ropes, threatening at times to become hopelessly entangled, but always, nevertheless, keeping at proper average distances. And now the moon reaches the earth with the point of her slender shadow-stick, and the sun, if he could speak, might call out: "A hit!"

But a moment later (an astronomical moment) the earth swings into line between the sun and its playmate and returns the hit with a sweep that seems to have annihilated the little player, until her smiling face reappears out of the shadow, eager for another round.

These skiey players will tirelessly continue their shadow frolics as long as the sun shines, spinning on together through the illimitable arena fenced by the starry gonfalons of the Milky Way, and you can imagine the guffaw of Olympian laughter with which they would greet the oracular announcement of some horoscopist that they were the slaves of an astrologer's lamp, condemned to foreshadow the little terrestrial fates and fortunes of ephemeral man!

Our Country.

'Tis the best work of Nature,
This country of ours;
It reveals to the future
Democracy's powers.
Here the laborer shares with
The rich and the great
In the work of the nation,
The affairs of the state.

Other countries have suffered
The sorrows that spring
From the rule of a monarch,
The court of a king;
But thou wast delivered
From tyranny's might
By one who enlightened
The world's darkest night.

Three countries remember
Our champion's name,
Though history grudges
His due meed of fame.
With his manly example
And eloquent pen
He was worth many squadrons
Of average men.

To him are indebted
Both Gentile and Jew
For rights now admitted
As everyone's due.
Yes, our glorious country
Was conceived in the brain
Of that grandest of statesmen,
The great Thomas Paine.
GEORGE LOWE.

Education in the Philippines.

The Department of Public Instruction of the Philippine Islands has issued from Manila a report which covers the school work for 1915. The number of schools in operation was 4,386, and the total enrollment reached 621,030, with 488 American teachers and 10,214 Filipinos.

Physical training is provided in addition to the ordinary academic course. Owing to regard for an old standard of propriety and decorum, it was hard at first to apply this to girls, but the difficulty was overcome, and athletic exercises among the people are now very popular—so much so that at the beginnings of the present year there were nine inter-provincial athletic associations in the islands.

Industrial instruction is given for the purpose of improving the condition of the people and their standard of living. Vocational teaching includes a farming course, and there are four agricultural schools in session throughout the year, the largest being in Central Luzon. There are also nautical, commerce, household industries and domestic science schools.

Badly Mixed.

"What's the matter, Bob?"
"Sam, who am I?"
"Why, you are yourself, Bob Harrison, ain't you?"
"No, far from it."
"Why, what's the matter?"
"Well, sir, I'm so mixed up, I don't know who I am."
"Well, sir, what's the matter?"
"Why, I'm married."
"Married? Why, sir, you should be happy."

"Yes, but I ain't. I'll tell you how it is. I married a widder, and this widder had a daughter. You see my father was a widower, and he married this daughter, so that makes my father my son-in-law, don't it? Well, don't you see how I am mixed up?"

"Well, sir, is that all?"
"No. Don't you see my step-daughter is my step-mother, ain't she? Well, her mother is my grandmother, ain't she? Well, I am married to her, ain't I? So that makes me my own grandfather, doesn't it?"

A Keen Observer.

A joke was played on Sir Arthur Conan Doyle by a French taxicab driver, if a story in the Gaulois is to be credited, says the London Mail. The man had driven Sir Arthur from the station to a hotel; and, when he received his fare, he said, "Merci, M. Conan Doyle."

"Why, how do you know my name?" asked Sir Arthur.

"Well, sir, I have seen in the papers that you were coming from the south of France to Paris; your general appearance told me that you were English; your hair had been clearly last cut by a barber of the south of France. I put these indications together, and guessed at once that it was you."

"That is very remarkable. You have no other evidence to go upon?"

"Well," said the man, "there was also the fact that your name was on your luggage."

Rabies Germ Was a Hornet.

As Mrs. Ben Hutton was visiting a neighbor, a cry of "mad dog" was heard. A large brindle cur, frothing at the mouth and with all the earmarks of rabies dashed through the yard and crawled under the house, uttering agonized howls.

Demands were made for a gun, but Mrs. Hutton would not let the dog be shot. Believing that something else besides madness ailed the dog, she went under the house after him to find out.

When she emerged, the anxious watchers were relieved to see the animal follow her, wagging his tail and apparently grateful for help of some kind.

"Wasn't the dog mad?" asked one of the onlookers.

"Possibly he was," replied Mrs. Hutton. "You'd be mad, too, if you had a hornet caught in your mouth."—Los Angeles Times.

The Best Way.

It was during the practical gardening lesson, in a large London school, when the teacher was instructing the boys in the art of protecting plants from the frost.

Jones was observed to be paying no attention to the master's remarks, so the instructor asked him sharply:

"Now, then, Jones, which is the best way to keep the May frosts from the plants?"

"Plant them in June, sir," was Jones's ready reply.

After Pleasing Others.

Mr. Bowen was having his Christmas dinner with the Reillys, and the seventeen-year-old son of the family was present.

"And what are you going to be when you grow up, young man?" asked Mr. Bowen of the little boy.

"Well," replied the boy thoughtfully, "after I've been a minister to please mother, an' a judge to please father, I'm goin' to be a policeman."

All Right.

Jones had just returned from his "annual" trip in his yacht, and was recounting his experiences.

"I never saw such a storm in all my life."

"Pardon me, my friend, since you saw the storm no doubt you can tell us what color it was."

"Certainly. The wind blew and the storm rose."

Anatomical Expert.

When a butcher answered the bell of his telephone instrument one day the shrill voice of a little girl greeted his ears. "Hello! Is that Mr. Wilson?"

"Yes," he answered kindly.

THE LETTER BOX.

LEROY RAYMOND, Pennsylvania.—No government religious reports have appeared for ten years. Then there was a census document entitled "Religious Bodies." For further information address the Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.

J. F. WRIGHT, Detroit, Mich.—We do not trust ourselves to retain for more than the time required to read them, the clippings which the sender desires to have returned. Hence your valuable collection showing the results of the Sunday revival in Canton, Ohio, are remailed. The real results of such revivals are carried away by the evangelist in his pocket.

RICHARD ROEBUCK, Massachusetts.—We generally take the view that letters by Freethinkers have performed their mission when they appear in the newspaper to which they are addressed, and hence we reproduce them only in exceptional cases. Your letters in the Boston Evening Record are admirable, and we appreciate your kindness in forwarding copies of them.

S. A. BASSETT, Kansas.—For information about Masonry we still refer inquirers to Editor Morcombe of the American Freemason, Storm Lake, Iowa, who knows all about it and can tell you whether or not, as the Catholic paper states, "American and Texas Masons are forbidden to communicate with French and Mexican Masons because of their Atheism." We should believe no unverified statement about Masons found in a Catholic paper.

G. W. CHASE, Washington, D. C.—As to the authenticity of the portrait of Roger Williams (T. S., Jan. 6), we are not prepared to vouch for it. The picture presented was obtained from the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Lincoln Center, Chicago, together with copy of a discourse on Williams by Mr. Jones (T. S. Aug. 16, 1913). If you will write to Mr. Jones, editor of Unity, as above, and remind him that he used the picture in June or July of the year named, you may receive information confirmatory of its authenticity.

A. H. THURSTON, Michigan.—If we can induce our readers to locate that poem instead of disturbing ourselves to look it up, we prefer to do so, and to that end quote the lines or fragments:

"At dead of night, while others sleep,
Near hell I took my station.
And from that dungeon dark and deep
O'erheard this conversation.

"I'm from the South," the ghost replied,
'And I was there a teacher.'

'I was a Southern preacher.'

Lines so familiar should quickly be placed by somebody.

H. W. W., Virginia.—Reference to the article "Chronology" in any good encyclopedia will give you "the whole history in connection with the starting of the system of keeping track of years." The Christian era has been in use about fifteen hundred years, having been computed and introduced in the sixth century by Dionysius Exiguus, "the little," a learned monk who was a native of Scythia. He figured that the year of the incarnation was coincident with the year 753 of Rome, or A. U. C., and his computation was adopted. He died about 556 of the era he invented. Our year 1 and our A. D. and B. C. are therefore based on a guess, for the date of the birth of Christ is unknown. Our New Year's day appears to have been chosen as the result of the blunders of astronomers in trying to fix the winter solstice, which is Dec. 22.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Mary Monico Appears Again.

In my last reply to Miss Verne Sheridan I showed how women are physically incapable of occupying, with any credit to themselves or benefit to the country, men's positions in public life generally, and political life in particular. In this article I propose to show that the mentality of woman is as unfit as her physique for competent discharge of masculine duties.

From unrecorded time until today, woman the world over has held a subordinate position. The position of the women of savage tribes is well known: the position of the ancient Chaldean and Egyptian women was, with the exception of sporadic outbursts of Woman's Rights propaganda, taking place without fail in the decadence of the nation, a position of a breeding-machine, provoker and panacea of man's passions, and perpetuator of his progeny. The Greek philosophers, with the single exception of Euripides, paid no heed to woman, and the glory of Rome was achieved and maintained only so long as woman held a position but little removed from the slave. When woman began to assert herself as man's equal, the fall of the nation was imminent. Many thinkers have accredited the emancipated women of those days with the downfall of their nations, but this is to impute to them a power which even in emancipation they did not possess. For although emancipated from the so-called bondage of man, they were not and naturally could not be emancipated from the bondage of their own inferior mentality. The logical deduction is that the nation must have been deeply undermined by the inevitable dangers of over-success, before woman could wield sufficient influence to obtain emancipation. A nation in plenitude of intellectual and economic vigor would never be threatened, cajoled or deceived into bestowing upon woman what must, in the natural order of things, prove to be her own and the country's worst enemy. Among modern nations, France, whose intellectual and military record is the most brilliant of all national reputes, is not agitated and was not agitated even before the war by female clamoring for freedom; and in England, whose constitution is certainly the freest of all countries and whose record is as pale a black as any other, the women have never had a particularly bright prospect of obtaining the franchise.

The feminization of a race is synonymous with its emasculation.

The great parrot-cry of the suffragists is: "Give women a chance! Only let us have a chance!" Woman has had her chance, a chance in every way equal to man's. When the first men and women evolved from their ape ancestors, if women had been man's mental superior she would have tricked him into subservience, and if his physical superior, she would have forced him to subordination. But she did neither. It was left for man to dare the elements, the wild beasts and war-like foes. It was left for man's ingenuity and man's courage to strive and scheme and achieve, so that all civilization now enjoys the fruits of his unflagging labors. And yet the way of man, especially of the men of great action, has been beset by difficulties fully as many and as great as the restrictions women aver men have placed upon them. From the medieval slave with his master's collar riveted on his neck to the average workman of today is a far, far cry. Men have striven against conditions than which the conditions of the women of all times have never been worse, and frequently much better, and yet man has overcome his almost overwhelming disabilities and has come out master.

When woman flung away her great chance, and casting in her lot with slaves, founded the Christian church, she proved for all time her innate slavishness of soul, and she locked the door in all real men's minds to her logical emancipation of the future.

And that great false step she has never retrieved, for today it is she who supports the church and maintains in shameless hypocrisy thousands of priests who had better be fed to cannon upon a European battlefield than remain in security, the panders of feminine folly.

It is now time to analyze this female mentality, which, starting out as an equal with man—for where neither has anything, each has the best of all, freedom—yet so lacked initiative, ingenuity, courage and ambition as to permit itself to be relegated to a secondary place and to own man as its master.

In this analysis I shall deal, one by one, with the particular points raised by the supporters of Woman Suffrage, and by a categorical refutation prove my case.

Now the first alleged truth that is dinned into our ears when we are picked out by the ardent propagandist as a possible convert to the Cause is woman's immense superiority over man in matters of sex.

Woman thinks far less of sex matters than man: her mind is infinitely purer than man's in its remoteness from such subjects. As a matter of stern fact, woman believes herself to be non-sexual because she is entirely sexual. Man, in whom the sexual instincts form but a portion of his physical and mental make-up, can thus get outside his sexuality and consider it in relation to his other desires and functions; whereas woman, being solely sexual, cannot see herself in this detached and critical manner, and having nothing with which to compare and compute her sexuality, arrives at the gratifying conclusion that she is less cursed with sexual attributes than man. What subjects compose the mind of the average man? His business, his sports, his country and his home. That is to say that the ambitious, emulative, belligerent and sexual instincts and the attributes whose development is dependent upon the liveliness of these instincts are all employed in the routine of the average man's daily life. And bid the average man search his memory for outstanding points of interest, you will find that they all have to do fairly equally with these various subjects. But search the memory of the average woman, and what is brought to light? Reminiscences of old lovers, proposals of marriage, ball gowns, babies, and above all, compliments. Every question of vital interest in the life of the average woman is a question of sex. Instinctively, woman knows herself to be a marketable being; she stands eternally to be bid for in the limelight of sex attractiveness, and she must necessarily regard everything, weigh everything, and judge everything from this standpoint. And, be it remembered, this standpoint of woman's stretches sex before her as the horizon of her mentality; whereas the standpoint of man shows his sex to be but one of the many points of importance upon his horizon.

Now the next claim put in for woman is her wonderful integrity. Woman is to purify and elevate political life until the present generation of "gentle grafters" will not be able to breathe the rarified atmosphere that her skirts will sweep into the halls of Congress. Virtually she will say: "My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves;" and she will at once proceed to tip over the tables and send the money-changers sprawling in the dust. At least this is the program drawn up by the ardent clamorers in the suffrage ranks. But does history justify the formulation of this sanguine and angel-winged schedule? Has woman in power ever proved herself so ardent a champion of right, so impregnable a repository of public weal as to warrant these radiant predictions of her future achievements? If we recall the name of Catherine de Medici, of Bloody Mary, of Elizabeth—the virgin queen, whose virginity was in exact ratio with her tolerance—of Madame de Pompadour, of Marie Antoinette, or to go farther back, of Poppaea, of Cleopatra, what do we find the leading traits of each and all of these women in power? Greed of vanity and power; an inordinate capacity for receiving compliments; an insatiable craving for sceptered might; inveterate hatred and remorseless persecution of all who braved their displeasure and questioned their wisdom; and lastly, an infallible gift for riding themselves and their countries of every statesman who happened to be in the right place. The record, with so few exceptions that they are hidden in the press of conformations to the rule, is one of quenchless vanity, despotic tyranny and ruthless hate. But it is not to be supposed that these women were to blame for these manifestations of their conceptions of the rights of power. Instinctively they felt that without the favor of their love, the fear of their hate, their laws would have no force. There is no force in woman's character; she is passive and receptive rather than active and creative, and it is not to be supposed that man, who knew himself to be the stronger in every way, would conform to laws passed by his inferior unless he could rely upon reward or count upon revenge. Hence the rule of woman was remarkable for the elevation of men who stooped to pander to the weaknesses of their sovereign queen; the utter condemnation of men brave enough to assert their manhood in the face of feminine tyranny, and the most egregious fostering of those peculiar female failings which were at once the cause and the effect of the condition of things.

And women are still women!

"But give us education, and then see!" is their incessant cry. The man of today is more highly educated, more broadly educated than the men of bygone centuries, and yet we see in him the very traits that characterized the very motives that actuated his great-grandfather. We even admit it. We say: "Civilization polishes the old Adam, but it doesn't dig him out." And for infallible proof, we read of the war in Europe. Why, then, seeing that education has not uprooted the prime attributes of man, do the suffragists augur such beneficent results from the broader education of women? Can they not see the analogy between the two cases? The statesman of today is a veritable Machiavelli in strategy and self-seeking, although his methods and aims are differently labeled. The modern woman possesses all the characteristics of her long-dead sisters, and, given the power, would employ them along fundamentally identical lines.

Woman is said to be so much more gentle and modest than man. Let us see! Man's sensibilities are so acute that he cannot bear scenes of suffering, either mental or physical. Man's avoidance of scenes of all kinds is an undisputed fact; whereas woman deliberately seeks such spheres for her activities as nurse, as district visitor, as war correspondent—in which last capacity she is universally decried as an inquisitive nuisance—for two reasons: first, because she revels in the role of martyr, and a nurse, for example, is superficially considered a martyr to tender duty; secondly, because she laps up pity as a cat laps milk, and investing herself not only with the pity that is supposed to be the just meed of the minister to suffering, but also with a sort of reflected pity evoked by her patient—a sick-room halo—at no expense of feelings, too blunt to appreciate fully the sights they encounter, she glories in an utter submergence of all her faculties in the enervating and luxurious sense of compassion that her occupation evokes.

And modesty? Mais, c'est à rire! Listen to the conversations of women among themselves, about the most private sex matters; know how careless they are of undressing before each other; look at their street dress, and observe that they never miss an opportunity of assuming full evening dress, and then vaunt their wonderful modesty if you still have the desire and the courage!

Woman, know this. You have had seven thousand years of chance, as long a chance as man. Who gave man his chance? No God, forsooth! He wrenched his opportunity from out the jaws of Fate. Before man subjected you, why did you not assert your equality? Why did you not stand firmly beside him before your chance was lost and you left hopelessly in the rear? Why on the roll of genius have you not engraved a single name fit to compete with the thousands of names man has written thereon? In music, from time immemorial, you have been free to sing and to play. Grant that your soul was imprisoned in man-made bonds in all other directions, there at least you have ever been at liberty to expand and pour forth all you might be. But, woman, you have no name, not one single name, that dares approach the majesty of Beethoven, of Mozart, of Tchaikowsky. In painting, in which you have been free for two hundred years to advance, you have not a single name to compete with Turner, with Rembrandt, with Angelo. For two hundred years you have written, and mark ye, not begun at the crude beginning as man was forced to do, but begun upon the foundations laid arduously by man, and yet you have no name, not a single name, that stands out with the splendor of Shakespeare, of Molière, of Cervantes. Woman, white men have never been given their chance. They have taken it. It is only African negroes and you who have wailed and moaned for opportunity to show what you might achieve. Did Napoleon beseech, "Sweet France, please, of your mercy, give me opportunity to become emperor"? No, a hundred times no. He made himself emperor, and he only fell because Europe grew hysterical like a frightened female and, like a pack of wolves upon a lion, rent him to death.

You think, woman of today, that your clamor for emancipation is an indication of the height to which civilization has reached. Do you not know that throughout history this emancipation question has broken out ever and again, an unsightly blotch upon the skin of a corrupt and degenerate nation? And the blotch has been buried with the putrefying corpse. History repeats itself, remember!

You say you are superior to man, that of the inmates of prisons only six per cent. are women. Men are imprisoned for rape, for seduction, for abduction. Prove to me that if the shameless employment of allurements by women to awaken the passions of men were made a criminal offense, then most of the white men suffering punishment for these crimes would not be matched by a female prisoner of equal guilt. You are poorly represented in jail, because you are not held responsible. We do not whip a child until its mind is developed. And many of the crimes of theft and embezzlement for which men suffer should be expiated by women whose extravagance was the incentive of the crime. Do not lament yourselves that even in prison you are poorly represented. If you were made economically responsible, dear ladies, you would make quite as bold a muster as the men. It is only that man intercedes for you as Christ interceded for those who tortured him—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

I throw this gauntlet: Give me the names of one woman writer, one woman musician, one woman painter, one woman scientist, one woman inventor, one woman philanthropist, one woman financier, who nearly approach to any of all these benefactors that man can produce, and then prove to me that even the degree of success they did attain was not attained through an incentive of love, of hate, of desire for publicity, of money, but solely through the abstract desire for truth that actuated Spinoza, Bruno, Ingersoll, and through the desire for broad self-expression that has actuated all men of genius, and if you really prove your case, I shall say: "Madame, your servant."

MARY MONICO.

"INGERSOLL AS HE IS."

TRUTH ABOUT THE LIFE, WORK AND CHARACTER OF COL. R. G. INGERSOLL

A refutation of the many baseless and false calumnies, libels, and slanders invented and circulated by the clergy of the United States and elsewhere. The work covers the career of Colonel Ingersoll in WAR, POLITICS, AND PUBLIC AND PRIVATE LIFE.

It disproves the statements contained in the slanders of his clerical vilifiers, and proves that:

1. He was brave in battle.
2. His army record is without a stain.
3. He was a friend of temperance.
4. His private life was above criticism.
5. He was always opposed to slavery.
6. He was one of the most charitable men in the world.
7. No member of his family ever joined the church.
8. He was sincere in his unbelief.
9. He never "advocated the circulation of impure literature."
10. His standing at the bar was high and irreproachable.
11. He was honored by the people of Peoria.
12. He did not "weaken" in his unbelief.

And that in a hundred ways he was exactly the opposite of what he is represented to have been by his preacher critics.

It includes the testimony and tributes of his army comrades and lifelong acquaintances.

The book is the most thorough exposé of clerical mendacity, deceit, unscrupulousness, ignorance, vindictiveness, and incorrigible lying ever published. It will bring the blush of mortification to the cheek of every honest clergyman.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Ideal Happiness.—Mrs. Quackness—"Am yo' daught-ah happily mar'd, Sister Sagg?"

Mrs. Sagg—"She sho' is! Bless goodness, she's done got a husband dat's skeered to death of her!"

Depends on How You Look at It.—Here is an anagram describing something women should know how to use, said the puzzle-giver. "It is O-T-S-V-E." "I know," said the suffragette happily. "It is 'VOTES.'" "No," growled the anti; "it is 'STOVE.'"

Yes Indeed.—At a party one evening a married woman was entertaining the assembled company with an account of their first quarrel, and how, after making it up with one another, her husband had planted a tree in remembrance of it. "If we had only done that," whispered the minister's wife to her husband, "what a splendid avenue we might have had."

Filled a Felt Want.—"See that man over there? He is a bombastic mut, a windjammer nonentity, a false alarm and an encumbrance on the earth."

"Would you mind writing all that down for me?"

"Why in the world—"

"He's my husband, and I should like to use it on him some time."—Brooklyn Citizen.

Quite So.—A crabbed old misogynist said to Ethel Barrymore at a dinner in Bar Harbor:

"Woman! Feminism! Suffrage! Bah! Why, there isn't a woman alive who wouldn't rather be beautiful than intelligent."

"That's because," said Miss Barrymore, calmly, "so many men are stupid while so few are blind."—Tribune.

She Wasn't So Crazy.—One of our most famous and gifted lecturers tells of a time he was delivering a lecture before several hundred inmates of a state insane asylum, when an old woman came down the aisle screaming and waving her arms frantically.

"My God! I can't stand this nonsense any longer!" she cried.

"That," said the superintendent to the great lecturer, "is the first sign she has shown of returning sanity."

Incomprehensible.—"Maggie, how was it that I saw a young man talking with you in the kitchen last night?" asked the mistress of her cook.

The girl pondered for a few moments and then answered, "Faith, an' I can't make it out meself; you must have looked through the keyhole."—Harper's.

Ladies, Try This.—Two ladies on the other side of the Border were holding a stairhead confab one morning on the troubles of life, and husbands in particular.

"I dinna wonder at some pur wives having to help themselves out of their husbands' trouser-pockets," remarked the one.

"I canna say I like them underhand ways myself," responded the second matron. "I jist turn ma man's breeches doonside up and help masel' off the carpet."—Tit-Bits.

Her Turn.—Smith got married. The evening of his pay-day he gave his bride fourteen dollars of the fifteen-dollar salary and kept only a dollar for himself.

But the second pay-day Smith gave his wife one dollar and kept fourteen dollars himself.

"Why, John," she cried, in injured tones, "how on earth do you think I can manage for a whole week on a paltry dollar?"

"Darned if I know," he answered. "I had a rotten time myself last week. It's your turn now."—Topeka State Journal.

The Peculiarities of Adam and Eve (Contributed to this column by a Distinguished Physician).—Sherlock Holmes, his terrestrial career terminated, presents himself at the heavenly gates, where Saint Peter inquires who he is. Proudly the king of detectives names himself and praises his exploits. "To enter you must first prove your statements," says the saintly gatekeeper; "and therefore take this telescope and pick out, amongst all the blessed inmates of Paradise, Adam and Eve."

After a very short search Sherlock Holmes shouts: "Here they are, Saint Peter," showing him the first earthly couple.

"Right, my son, but how did you make them out?"

"Most easily, father: Of all human beings they are the only ones without a navel."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. The announcement that we have it is sufficient.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

NEW EDITION "THE CHRIST"

A Critical Review and Analysis of the Evidences of His Existence
By JOHN E. REMSBURG
Author of "The Bible," "Six Historic Americans," etc.

In deciding who Jesus was we are compelled to choose between the character drawn with scores of divergences in the synoptics, and that other character which is elaborated by the gospel of John; for nothing is plainer than that though Matthew, Mark and Luke may have the same Jesus in mind, theirs is not the Jesus of John. Little of the Jesus limned in one of the gospels is preserved in the others, except the name. With the name left out would anybody be sure that all the gospel writers were writing of the same man? What resemblance is there between the Jesus Christ of the synoptics and the Christ Jesus of Paul that does not subsist between either of them and any other "messiah" known to the history of religion?

One who begins Mr. Remsburg's book with curiosity to learn what can be said for the myth theory is likely to end with the conviction that this theory alone is supported by probability.

There are chapters on Christ's Real Existence Impossible; Silence of Contemporary Writers; Christian Evidence; Infancy of Christ; The Resurrection of Christ; Character and Teachings; The Christ a Myth; Sources of the Christ Myth. An Index of 19 pages enables the reader to open the book at the place where he desires to reread or at the subject to which he wishes to refer.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen, Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen; And will lend grace in coming time To queens of beauty more sublime." (Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

CHURCH AND WINE CUP.

Favor Shown Ministers and Priests in the District of Columbia Prohibition Bill.

BY JOHN D. BRADLEY.

President Washington Secular League.

"The Christian cannot deny that Christ himself blessed the wine cup, and passed it on through the Christian generations."—JOHN E. REMSBURG.

Preceding the passage by the Senate, on January 9, of a prohibition measure for the District of Columbia, which it is expected will be enacted into law at this session of Congress owing to the demands of religionists throughout the country and the activity of their agents and lobbyists at Washington, chief of whom is the Rev. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, legislative superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America, the following communication was sent to several Senators by the president of the Washington Secular League:

DEAR SENATOR: A feature of the proposed prohibition legislation for the District of Columbia pending in the Senate has been arraigned by yourself and other Senators as discriminatory and as "playing favorites." In view of this permit me to call your attention to the fact that this vice, in all the circumstances, is more glaringly and shamelessly exhibited in another feature of the proposed legislation which seems not to have been made the object of criticism. This feature is one of special interest and concern to a class of citizens of the District of Columbia and of the United States generally whom I have the honor to represent as president of the Washington Secular League, which is affiliated with the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation and the Rationalist Association of North America. We are not concerned with the question of prohibition, but we are interested especially in having observed that vital, fundamental, and axiomatic principle of our government and civilization which forbids any governmental favor or preference to religion and its representatives and institutions. In our opinion the feature of the proposed prohibition legislation for the District of Columbia to which I wish to direct your attention clearly involves a violation of this principle.

It is well known that religious organizations and the adherents of religious bodies boast themselves as the chief force behind this proposed legislation for the District as well as all prohibition legislation. A leading religious journal, the Christian Herald of New York city, has declared that "the victory of prohibition indicates the virility of the church." One instance indicating the source whence comes the greatest pressure for prohibition legislation was afforded by a press dispatch from Durham, N. C., under date of December 8 past, reciting that "the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church South, representing 87,904 laymen and 230 ministers, in annual conference here, memorialized both Houses of Congress to enact legislation prohibiting the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia and to forbid the use of the mails to whisky literature."

Yet, strange to say, almost without exception every prohibition measure enacted or proposed in this country contains a provision exempting in more or less degree churches and their clergymen from the prohibition rule imposed upon the rest of society. The measure in question for the District of Columbia, while seeking to impose a most rigid prohibitory rule upon the rest of the community with respect to alcoholic liquors, is very careful to make an exception in favor of the use of such liquors for "sacramental" purposes, providing that "when any minister, pastor, or priest of a religious congregation or church desires wine for sacramental purposes in the usual exercises of his denomination," he shall be permitted to purchase, import, and use the same in quantities not permitted to the members of the community generally nor to the representatives of other organizations or interests. The same discrimination obtained in the Smoot substitute, notwithstanding its author claimed it to be absolutely prohibitory and devoid of the objectionable feature of "playing favorites."

Now, in view of the fact that it is from churches and their representatives and adherents that the chief demand for prohibitory legislation comes, it does not look well that they should be given a measure of exemption from the rule which they would impose upon the rest of the community. On the contrary it would seem that consistency and moral soundness would require that they should be the first to subject themselves to the prohibitory rule and the very last to seek or accept any sort of exemption therefrom.

Why should the churches assume to have imposed upon the community at large a rule which they themselves are unwilling to practice?

If the churches themselves, the great force back of prohibitory legislation, cannot abandon the use of alcoholic liquors, how and why should it be expected that the community generally can or should do so? And would it not be most unfortunate to have the law in such form as to leave upon the churches and their clergy and upon their most sacred religious rite the stigma which the law in effect would impose with respect to the use of alcoholic liquors?

Will it be contended that a beverage which the churches hold to be so evil in its nature and effect that its use cannot be tolerated by the community at large, and that it should even be outlawed for the good of society, is a proper and necessary beverage for "sacramental" purposes?

Is that which is too unholy to be dispensed at the bar or placed to the lips of the citizen proper to be dispensed from the communion table and swallowed by religionists in the sacramental rite?

Of course, the contention will be that this latter is not a beverage use of alcoholic liquor. But as a matter of fact it is used as a beverage in the rite in question. The rite calls for the use of a beverage. And that the quantity so used is not altogether negligible is shown by the fact that the proposed prohibition law for the District allows five gallons every twenty days to every "minister, pastor, or priest" in the District?

We are convinced that a clear discrimination is here made in the matter of the purchase, importation, and use of alcoholic liquors in favor of ministers, pastors, and priests, and in favor of the use of such liquors as a beverage by the churches.

Now, it is a well established judicial and legal principle in this country that exemption from a public rule or law which the interests of society requires to be imposed cannot be claimed on the ground of religious belief or practice. "To permit this would be to make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself," declared the Supreme Court of the United States in the polygamy case of Reynolds v. United States (98 U. S., 145).

Now, if the interests of this community and of society require prohibitory legislation against the use of alcoholic liquors that legislation should be made to apply without qualification or exception to churches and their representatives as well as to the rest of the community, and no sort of modification or exception should be granted on the ground of religious belief or practice. Under the principle referred to, that belief or practice should be compelled to give way wherever it comes in conflict with the general rule and law which it is deemed the interest of the community requires to be imposed.

One distinguished Senator did venture to assert in the course of the consideration of the pending measure that "there is no spiritual virtue in wine" and that "in the interest of good morals I think the time will come when the ministers of the different churches will come to that conclusion, and that its use will be entirely done away with, as I think it should be." (Congressional Record, Dec. 16, 1916, p. 457.)

It would appear that the best time to have the churches cease from the use of alcoholic wine would be when at their demand the rest of the community are compelled to cease from its use, and if this is not done can it be disputed that there has been made in their favor a discrimination that is clearly inconsistent with the principle that religious belief and practice is not a proper ground of exemption from a rule which society imposes upon its members generally and with that vital, fundamental, axiomatic principle of our government and civilization to which I alluded in the beginning that forbids any governmental favor or preference to religion or its representatives and institutions?

My effort has been to make man superior to superstition—to educate him to that degree that he shall need no crutches, and to convince him that a good cause never has needed, and never will, need the assistance of falsehood.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

JOHN D. BRADLEY

A SYMPOSIUM ON JESUS.

The Jesus of Josephus.

Dr. Wakefield, no doubt, is trying to be as impartial as he knows how; but when a man starts to controvert another's theory he starts with a bias. He does not give my compilation of facts the least weight, nor seek to explain how such a compilation could be made from a book purporting to give an altogether different story. The facts pointed out are utterly incompatible with the historicity of the gospel record, and yet he refers to me as accepting these gospels as "reliable history." I am not quoting because I look upon them as history, but because I look upon them as contradictory traditions. They were compiled by numerous men at long intervals of time. The basic tradition is a Jewish one. No man can study the record without seeing this; and no man of intelligence can fail to see that the Jewish tradition was changed to suit gentile purposes. In my last reply to the doctor, I tried to summarize again, from the contradictory testimony, the unguarded words and statements that led me to fix the probable time that this Jewish Jesus lived. Such evidence needs to be repeated and rerepeated before it becomes effective on obdurate minds. When they are required to explain how it came into a record purporting to tell an altogether different story they will begin to see that they are not dealing with a pure myth. When this unconsciously expressed gospel evidence is confirmed by historic evidence, the "poor mortals" who know no other "rule of logic" than authority, are at their wits' end, and resort to travesty and satire.

If Jesus, as I hold, did not live at the time assigned, was not an important character, and was not crucified under Pontius Pilate, it was highly improbable that Philo could ever have heard of him. Philo was likely dead when Jesus became known as the Christ, A. D. 64 to 68. The silence of geographers, philosophers and historians can be advanced only to refute the claim that he was a great man and performed miracles, which is no part of my theory. All of Mr. Wakefield's authorities are intent on disproving the gospel Christ, whose death caused preternatural darkness over all the earth. As this Christ never lived, they are right. The real Jesus was never put to death by the Romans, hence they could leave no record of him. Incidental reference to the "shedding of his blood" and "hanging on a tree" led me to suspect that he was killed by the Jews, as the writings of Peter, Paul, and the "Acts" plainly imply. Mr. Wakefield, therefore, should begin to understand that his accumulated authorities count for nothing when dealing with my theory. They never conceived the probable truth. Drews was so anxious to prove the whole story a myth that he went so far as to assert that every reference to John the Baptist in Josephus was a forgery. It would be far more sensible to cut the knot by declaring the whole book a forgery, as W. H. Burr did. Authority such as that, I can only laugh at. It outrages all natural probability, and is invented to support a false theory.

Mr. Wakefield began by asserting that Origen knew of no reference to Jesus, the Christ in Josephus. After the evidence that he did is pushed upon him he concludes that he forged it. This foundationless guess he thinks will help him over a difficulty. But it does not. I return to the evidence, and reassert "he will have to prove that the whole chapter was forged" by Origen. He will find it incumbent on him, if it is not upon Rationalists generally, "to do more than mobilize the evidence necessary to make a critical survey of ecclesiastical institutions," whatever that inky verbiage may mean. I want no shuffling. Tell me why Origen forged this chapter. What was his motive? If it was forged, it was forged twenty years before his reply to Celsus. The text I quoted was taken from his commentary on Matthew, which was written A. D. 230. The reply to Celsus was written A. D. 250. He could not then have been "hard pressed for evidence" and compelled to resort to forgery. The fact is he did use it on Celsus also, and did not later discover it, as Dr. Wakefield implies. He did "provide it for that exigency," in spite of the doctor's denial, based on his confidence in lame authority. In Book 1, pp. 35, 36, Contr. Celsus, he uses these words: "I would say to Celsus . . . that one who lived but a little while after John and Jesus, wrote how that John was a baptizer unto the remission of sins; for Josephus testifies in the eighteenth book of his Jewish Antiquities that John was the Baptist, and that he promised purification to those that were baptized. The same Josephus also, although he did not believe in Jesus as the Christ, when he was inquiring as to the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem . . . ought to have said [italics mine] that their machinations against Jesus was the cause of their miseries; yet, as one not remote from the truth said, 'these miseries befel the Jews by way of revenge for James the Just, who was the brother of Jesus that was called the Christ.'"

What Josephus said concerning James the Just in his "inquiry as to the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem" has never come down to us. It is certainly not in any edition now extant of his works. It was probably culled from some wholly manufactured book that others had quoted before Origen, and whose spuriousness was detected. What Josephus "ought to have said" to confirm the gospel record was finally put into actual forgeries.

Origen, like all the rest, was hard pressed, and tortured the meagre reference Josephus really made out of its meaning and to his best advantage. He goes on to explain to Celsus that this brother of Christ was not really a brother, the word being used in a church sense. Had Origen forged the text he would have allowed no such a handicap to exist; but would have made the reference to cover completely what "he ought to have said." The man who forges has no scruples about this.

If Dr. Wakefield will carefully consider these facts it will become "perfectly clear" that the quotation is not forged; and that, alike in what it says and what it leaves unsaid, it proves the falsity of Eusebius' later forgery to meet what Josephus "ought to have said."

I am too obtuse to understand how "the spirit displayed in Mr. Eccles' denial" of Origen's contention that the James referred to by Josephus was not an actual brother and was not actually stoned to death "is unfortunate." Please explain wherein. Origen had false scriptures to defend; I have none. He wanted to verify the gospels and the epistles as genuine. I have no such concern. Taking Josephus at his word I can come to no other conclusion than that the Jesus he refers to was alive A. D. 64, and the James dead.

If Dr. Wakefield wants to be impartial he should consider my whole theory, and not dwell on quoted authority that has really no bearing on the case. Conybeare denies that Photius made any such statement as alleged, and if he did it might prove nothing but his own misdirected vision as to where to hunt for a historical Christ. That chapter of Josephus cannot be discredited without discrediting the whole book. I will listen patiently to any effort in this direction, but insist that the doctor must meet me squarely on my own ground. The implication that I am "grieved" or "angry" with courteous criticism is nonsense. I put the theory forward strictly as a theory, believing it to be the best yet offered. The law of survival will determine its merits.

I am not "fabricating modifications of scripture," nor "expunging" anything that does not require to be expunged to meet scientific and historic knowledge. I am taking the tales of several false witnesses, comparing their points of rational agreement, their inadvertent admissions, etc., and constructing the probable origin of their diversified myths.

DAVID ECCLES.

The Goliaths Against David.

In my opinion the second passage of Josephus that mentions Christ is lacking just as much in evidence of its genuineness as the first one (see Josephus' "Antiquities" xviii, 3, 3.), yet the critical eye of David Eccles sees in the phrase "who is called Christ" a genuine Josephus expression, while the other is an interpolated forgery.

In the December 16, 1916, TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Eccles says:

"In spite of Origen and all the church authorities I will insist that this 'brother of Jesus' was actually stoned to death, and could not live afterwards as 'James the Just,' who was seen by Paul, and referred to as a 'brother of the Lord' in a church sense."

In his article, "Idealistic Rationalism," TRUTH SEEKER, December 30, 1916, Homer Wakefield, M.D., writes:

"Archeologists, especially Egyptologists, Assyriologists, Syriologists, and Persiologists, are adding an immense literature of monumental remains of those ancient civilizations from which Christianity is largely derived. From this great literature a few scientifically trained Rationalists, such as Prof. Arthur Drews of Karlsruhe, Germany; the Rt. Hon. John M. Robertson, M.P., of London, England, and our own Prof. William Benj. Smith, are gradually adapting data to the elucidation of biblical fiction."

Let us examine some of the authorities Dr. Wakefield has pointed out, and then see what our David of Rationalism can do with these modern Goliaths of higher criticism—or perhaps find out what these Goliaths may do to him.

In his book entitled "The Christ Myth" Prof. Arthur Drews has this to say on page 230:

"As for the testimony of Josephus in his 'Antiquities' which was written 93 A. D., the first passage (viz., xviii, 3, 3) is so evidently an after-insertion of a later age, that even Roman Catholic theologians do not venture to declare it authentic though they always attempt with pitiful naïveté, to support the credibility of pre-Christian documents of this type. But the other passage, too, which states that James was executed under the authority of the priest Ananos (A. D. 62) and refers to him as 'the brother of Jesus, the so-called Christ,' in the eminent theologians such as Credner, Schurer, etc., must be regarded as a forgery, but even if its authenticity were established it would still prove nothing in favor of the historical Jesus. For, first, it leaves undecided whether a bodily relationship is indicated by the word 'brother,' or whether as is much more likely the reference is merely to a religious brotherhood. Secondly, the passage only asserts that there was a man of the name of Jesus who was called Christ, and this is in no way extraordinary in view of the fact that at the time of Josephus, and far into the second century, many gave themselves out as the expected Messiah."

In "The Evolution of Man" by W. W. Hardwicke, M.D., we find these words on page 193:

"1. There are the gospels, which, as we have seen, are too contradictory, and the narratives contained in them too like those told of the numerous pagan Messiahs before him to be genuine. 2. There is a passing notice of him in the Jewish Talmud. 3. There are two passages in Josephus which can be easily perceived, on examination, to be forged interpolations. And 4. There is a passage in the 'Annals' of Tacitus, also shown to be a forgery."

These "two passages in Josephus" to which Hardwicke refers are xviii, 3, 3, and the one in which "the brother of Jesus, the so-called Christ," is spoken of.

In his "Trying to Find Jesus" article Mr. Eccles gives as his reason for believing in the authenticity of this second passage of Josephus:

"Josephus' mode of reference to Jesus and James is so peculiar as to afford additional evidence of the genuineness of the text. Wherever Josephus mentions a name, as in the Jesus above, he always associates it with parentage or title to designate the particular individual he means. We have Jesus, the son of Nun, Jesus son of Saphat, Jesus son of Gamala, Jesus son of Ananus, etc., through a long line of Jesuses. In the case of Jesus the Christ and his brother James, he evidently did not know their parentage, and so was compelled to use the title of one to designate both, viz., 'James the brother of Jesus, who was called the Christ.' They were both imports, whose origin was unknown."

It is therefore to Prof. Wm. Benjamin Smith that we turn for the most emphatic denial of the genuineness of the second passage; and as if in answer to this very idea of Mr. Eccles, Professor Smith says on pages 234 and 235 of his "Ecce Deus":

"A second reference of Josephus to Jesus might be imagined in the following paragraph (Arch. xx, 9:1) treating of the death of James, 'the brother of the Lord': 'Ananus then being such (as I have said), fancying he had now a fitting opportunity, since Festus was dead and Albinus was still on the road, assembled a Sanhedrin of judges, and having brought thither the brother of Jesus, him called Christ (James was his name), and some certain others, and having made accusations (against them) as lawbreakers, he delivered them to be stoned.'"

"The words in italics," says Professor Smith on page 235 of his book, "have been regarded as spurious—we think correctly. Neander and others defend them, and McGiffert says ('Church History of Eusebius,' p. 127, n. 39): 'It is very difficult to suppose that a Christian, in interpolating the passage, would have referred to James as the brother of the so-called Christ.' Indeed! On the contrary, it is just because this phrase is the most approved Christian, evangelistic and canonic that we suspect it in Josephus. It meets us in Matthew i, 16; xxvii, 17, 22; John iv, 25. The depreciatory 'so' is not in the Greek."

The verses from Matthew and John show the truth of Professor Smith's statement. The italics are mine, for the benefit of the reader.

Matthew i, 16: "And Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ."

Matthew xxvii, 17, 22: "Therefore when they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ?"

"Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ?"

John iv, 25 gives us: "The woman saith unto him, I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ."

Again quoting from Wakefield's "Idealistic Rationalism":

"The greatest pitfall which Rationalists encounter is the temptation to an unwarranted acceptance of parts of Bible narratives as established historical facts, and then founding upon such accepted parts speculative superstructures of hypothetical formulae as a basis of rationalistic belief."

"Many able writers of the past have fallen victims to this fault. When we read their works, we meet with so many accepted passages from the Bible, with hypotheses based upon them which have since been disproved, that the weight of their good parts is nullified and their value obscured. Thus the works of Voltaire, Humboldt, Paine, Sawyer, Renan, and even Ingersoll, once so radical, now appear more or less orthodox and contain many statements to which, with our later knowledge, we cannot subscribe."

This shows the importance of accuracy in everything that relates to the Christ myth, and we heartily agree with the following from Drews' "Historicity of Jesus," Preface, page x:

"The question of the historicity of Jesus is a purely historical question; it must be settled with the resources of historical research. This procedure is, however, in view of the close connections of the subject with emotional and religious elements, not inconsistent with the fact that the final decision belongs to an entirely different province, that of philosophy, which also controls subjective feeling. In this sense, the question whether Jesus was an historical personage coincides with the question of the significance of personality in the general order of the world, and of the roots and motives of the religious life generally.

"The controversy in regard to the Christ-myth is at the same time for the freedom and independence of the modern mind, and of science and philosophy. Let there be no mistake about it: as long as the belief in an historical Jesus survives we shall not succeed in throwing off the yoke of an alleged historical fact which is supposed to have taken place two thousand years ago, yet has profoundly affected the science and philosophy of Europe. What a situation it is when the deepest thoughts of the modern mind must be measured by the teaching of Jesus, and referred to a world of ideas that has nothing to recommend it but the antiquity of its tradition and the artificially engendered appreciation of everything connected with it." (The italics here are also mine.)

That Drews is right in his statement that "as long as the belief in an historical Jesus survives we shall not succeed in throwing off the yoke of an alleged historical fact" is evidenced from the fact that many of our Socialist friends, Freethinker as well as Christian, try to show that this historical Jesus was "the first great Socialist," the Socialistic Freethinkers taking their picture of this individual from Renan's "Life of Jesus," whereas none of the Jesuses or Christs of Josephus' day knew anything about Socialism or the philosophy thereof.

Again, if Mr. Eccles is right in his interpretation of the genuineness of the second passage of Josephus, then not only are Drews, Hardwicke and Professor Smith wrong, but also some of the ablest Rationalist lecturers upon our platform, notably Mangasarian, Gauvin and Spradling, all of whom have been teaching the absolute myths of this New Testament person. While the Freethinker is more tolerant of his teachers and their views than the orthodox, yet if they err in historical research one has as much right to call them down as if they had made a mistake in material science because of too much theological bias.

In conclusion, let me say that there are some Freethinkers who, as Dr. Wakefield says, are living in "the dear dead days" of a past age and century. The psychology of the human mind is a funny thing. For instance, the Roman Catholics and some Protestants are living in the days of 4 A. D.; the Lutherans in the historic epoch of Martin Luther; the Methodists in the days of Charles and John Wesley; the Swedenborgians in the age of Emanuel Swedenborg; the Spiritualists in the time of Andrew Jackson Davis; the Unitarians in the good old Revolutionary days of Thomas Paine; the Christian Scientists in the epoch of Bishop Berkely; and there are some Freethinkers, of whom Mr. Eccles may be considered one, living mentally three or four decades ago, in the time when Ingersoll was at his best; who, were he living in his prime to-day, might not only consider "The Mistakes of Moses," but the mistake of some advanced Rationalists concerning the Christ that never was and never will be except in the imaginations of men. So we would courteously ask Mr. Eccles to step across the border-line of the nineteenth century into the twentieth and inform himself through the down-to-date works of Drews, Robertson, Hardwicke and Professor Smith on this question of the Christ myth.

JOHN A. MORRIS.

Another Theory.

I have a theory regarding the historicity of Jesus I will offer. It is somewhat different from the others advanced in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but it dovetails in with them at places, and while I am not at all confident of its soundness, it accords with more of the facts than any other view I know of.

My principal point is that John the Baptist was the first leader in the origin of the Christian movement. During several centuries previous to the Christian era a school of prophecy flourished that looked forward to the coming of a messiah and the ending of the world. Probably, according to their figuring, they believed the time had arrived, and John the Baptist came forward with the announcement that the Kingdom of Heaven was at hand. His preaching appears to have aroused considerable interest and excitement and finally to have been looked upon by Herod as dangerous for the government. So John was put to death. Very likely the excitement among his followers continued and was especially pronounced at the time of the Passovers at Jerusalem. Probably at the first pass-over after John's death some of his followers and other adherents of the Jesus or Savior-god cult, after a lot of religious emotionalism, reached the psychological condition of believing that the pass-over had been celebrated in the old manner for the last time and that the mythical lamb of God so often slain in the rite had actually become manifest to them in their own flesh. Instead of returning home as usual after the passover, they lingered at Jerusalem, fasting, praying, and enthusing in general. Finally they began to see and hear things, or, if you prefer, to see visions and hear revelations. This explanation harmonizes with the chronology of Acts and the epistles and with the fact that the apostolic writings show no clear evidence of belief in a human Jesus, since none of them appear ever to have quoted him or to have cared a rap about anything he ever said or did, but, on the contrary, got all their advice from mystical communications with him after, according to the gospels, he had ascended to heaven. Having arrived at this enthusiastic frame of mind, the next step was to make the views known and being the work of converting the world.

But probably many Jews were not satisfied with such a savior and continued to look for a political messiah who would restore the kingdom. This must have continued up to the time of the fall of Jerusalem. I am inclined to think that a man named Jesus may have lived and prophesied not long prior to this event, as Mr. Eccles and Mr. Muskat contend. He may not have been an impressive figure, but may have had a few followers.

Christianity is a combination, if this theory be correct, of at least three lines of believers. First, the followers of John the Baptist; second, the followers of the Jesus, or Savior-god cult, in which the crucifixion was merely a record of the passover rite, somewhat as J. M. Robertson maintains; third, the followers of the human and perhaps comparatively insignificant Jesus claiming to be the God Jesus, not long before the fall of Jerusalem.

Why Some Persons Believe in Jesus.

I have often wondered why people believe in Jesus. I know a few people, and some who have been telling the world for forty years that they have tried to follow Jesus. Of course they lied, as every person lies who says he is a follower of Jesus. Lots of persons run after Jesus. I see them, and I say to myself: Is it to help Jesus or themselves? Human nature is pretty much the same in all human beings; perhaps a little more so in some than in others, but I never saw a man who, when he "got religion," left his human nature behind.

Why do men believe in Jesus? What for? It is for something. And it is for something particular. There is no religion in faith in Jesus, unless religion is one of the meanest things on earth. The faith in Jesus is a cheap faith. Such faith is not for the benefit of the race, not to make men, women and children happier and better, not to lift mankind higher and make mankind nobler. Oh, no! There is not a great, altruistic motive in faith in Jesus. It is a little faith, a mean faith, a selfish faith—this religious faith in Jesus.

A man believes in Jesus because he is taught by Christian ministers that such a belief will save his soul, and because he knows of no cheaper way to save his soul, and because he wants his soul saved if all other souls are lost. Pure, undefiled selfishness is at the bottom of all the faith in Jesus. The man who is great enough, true enough, to live an honest life, to trust each day as it comes; to put his hand in the rising sun and go with it until it sets, and then to trust in its rising to-morrow would scorn to get something for nothing, would scorn to take everlasting joy for saying, "I believe," would be ashamed to ask for more than his life deserved.

I have always hated the word "salvation," as used by the church. I look upon a person who has been "saved" as having been reduced in size, as being so much less a man. There is something grand and heroic to me in the person who does not try to dodge his fate, who accepts whatever life brings to him with a smile, or, at least, without growling.

It is the man who thinks more of himself than of anybody, or anything else, who stands up for Jesus. He believes in Jesus just simply to be saved. He thinks so well of himself that he wants to perpetuate his existence for his own enjoyment.

Most persons believe in Jesus for what they expect to get out of it. This belief is a good investment. It is everlasting life insurance without any fee.

It is strange to me that so many men and women can be "saved" without asking themselves if they are worth saving. There is such a lot of cheap, rotten believers that decent men steer clear of the church.

I want a faith that will make this world better! I want a faith that will save man here! I want a faith that will pay a man for what he does, and pay young girls better wages. I want a faith in good deeds; in right actions; I want a faith that is sensible and reasonable; I want a faith in good homes, in good cities and towns, in a good nation and in a good government; I want a faith in good schools and in good books, in all that is calculated to educate human beings; I want a faith in facts, in what actually exists. I want a faith in the universe whether there is God in it or not. L. K. W.

Definite Religion.

In religious matters it is necessary to be very indefinite. It is perfectly permissible to deny belief in the doctrines of the church in the abstract but it is not considered good form to deny any particular doctrine like the atonement or the ascension. It is right to doubt the stories in the Old Testament or even to make fun of them, but it is not permitted to say that the Old Testament is not inspired. It is almost orthodox to admit that evolution is a more probable theory of the formation of the world than the account in Genesis, but we seldom hear in any pulpit the equally well established fact that the Biblical account of the creation, and of all other ideas usually considered original, have been derived from other previous writings or traditions; and that these traditions have been articles of religion to the races which previously had them. Mr. Slosson writes in the Independent that "to many of us it seems equally a matter of indifference whether the nature of Deity is simple, as Unitarians say, or triune, as the Trinitarians assert." But there is no place for the equally true statement that the Four Gospels were not written by four of Christ's disciples, nor even by eye witnesses, but by unknown men of much greater ability who wrote in the latter part of the first century, or later, and who had never seen the events they record. Mr. Slosson continues: "It is all right to say that one has never heard satisfactory proof of a miracle, but to go farther and deny the possibility of miracles is to assume a burden of proof that would break the back of any philosopher." But it could also be added that the proof of miracles is not well established by the testimony only of those who have grievously erred in their report of other occurrences. He rightly says that the Congregational and Unitarian churches are the only denominations that are sufficiently liberal, but he does not continue the inference that if Jesus was not of divine origin in a different sense from other men, then the whole fabric of Christianity falls. If he was born as other men, died as other men, and did not ascend in the body to Heaven, what becomes of the church doctrines?

ATWOOD MANVILLE.

Men of great genius, whether their work be in poetry, philosophy or art, stand in all ages like isolated heroes, keeping up single-handed a desperate struggle against the onslaught of an army of opponents. Is not this characteristic of the miserable nature of mankind? The dullness, grossness, perversity, silliness and brutality of by far the greater part of the race, are always an obstacle to the efforts of the genius, whatever be the method of his art; they so form that hostile army to which at last he has to succumb. Let the isolated champion achieve what he may: it is slow to be acknowledged; it is late in being appreciated, and then only on the score of authority; it may easily fall into neglect again, at any rate for a while. Ever afresh it finds itself opposed by false, shallow, and insipid ideas, which are better suited to that large majority, and so generally hold the field. Though the critic may step forth and say, like Hamlet when he held up the two portraits to his wretched mother, "Have you eyes? Have you eyes?" alas! they have none. When I watch the behavior of a crowd of people in the presence of some great master's work, and mark the manner of their applause, they often remind me of trained monkeys in a show. The monkeys' gestures are, no doubt, much like those of men; but now and again they betray that the real inward spirit of those gestures is not in them. Their irrational nature peeps out.—Arthur Schopenhauer.

Just Try It.

Religions, as a rule (and I know of no exception to the rule), are foolish, and their followers, as a rule (and I know of no exception to the rule), are stupid. Saying so much by way of introduction, I will proceed with my article.

I wish to address particularly Jews and Roman Catholics, as I regard these believers as about as stupid as they make them. A Jew is afraid of pork. A hog, or even a pig, is the Jew's nightmare. And yet there is no reason for it. There is no sense in his fear of roast sparerib or of deviled ham. I have no doubt that he eats many things more harmful than pork. I wish to suggest to the Jew that he order and eat a nice piece of fried ham and watch the results. I assure him that the sun will not be thrown out of its course, or the seasons delayed, on account of his indulgence. Just try it and see.

The Roman Catholic observes, perhaps, the most stupid and senseless performances of any believer. He is easily scared, easily humbugged, and easily led. The Roman Catholic, the good, stupid one, will not eat meat on Friday. It is a sin to do so, and the church attaches a religious penalty for this sin. And yet to eat any kind of meat on Friday would have just the same effect on the one who eats it as it would have on him on any other day of the week, and no other. Try it and see! It is all nonsense that a beefsteak eaten on Friday would give a man delirium tremens, or a lamb chop make him kill his wife. There is no sin in getting drunk on Friday, and no proof that fish eaten on that day plays an important part in saving the soul.

The Roman Catholic male lifts his hat when he goes by a church (not a Protestant one). Now, there is no harm in such an act of itself, but when it is done as a religious duty it is foolish. It effects nothing. It is not a guarantee that the one who does it will escape danger on his journey.

I am neither Jew nor Roman Catholic, and I have lived on this earth for more than seventy years, and I have eaten what I pleased, when I pleased, and without asking permission of any priest, minister, or rabbi, and I have been as healthy as most human beings, and I have passed all kinds of churches thousands of times and have never lifted my hat to one of them or to what is on the outside or inside of the edifice.

While a Jew would have fever and ague if his hand should touch a sausage, and a Roman Catholic have a fit if his priest caught him eating an Irish stew on Friday, I wish to assure both Jew and Roman Catholic that it is only their superstitious faith that affects them. Pork will not hurt a Jew, nor meat on Friday hurt a Roman Catholic. Just try it and see.

Haeckel's "Conversion."

The announced "conversion" to militarism of Prof. Ernst Haeckel, the most distinguished living man of science, is a belated piece of intelligence to be appearing as news. It is treated like some change that has come over the mind of Haeckel as a result of the present war; and yet the last of his utterances, so far as is known, was a condemnation of war. In Haeckel's "Eternity," a translation of which was published last year by the Truth Seeker Company, he said:

"I myself am on principle a pacifist. For a number of years I have belonged to several peace societies in Germany, Austria, France and England, which carried on a propaganda against war." He expresses a hope "in the end to abolish the application of rude force between hostile competitive nations and replace it by rational conciliation or a neutral court of arbitration." He bases this possibility on the fact that we have "almost completely abolished the notorious law of the strong hand and of bloody revenge," and that we have succeeded "in practically eliminating the duel, which is meaningless unless one believes in the superstition of a divine judgment." While sharing the opinion fostered in his own country that the Prussian army is "a national army for defense," he condemns "swash-buckling about the 'glorious army,' constant parading and waving of flags and celebrations of historical victories."

What is mistaken for Haeckel's conversion to militarism is the discovery that while in the second edition of his "History of Creation," published in 1870, he expressed himself severely with regard to the effect on civilization of what he termed "military selection," when the third edition appeared in 1872 the strongest condemnatory passages were cut out. Hence it appears that the alteration in the text of the "History of Creation" upon which is based the report of his change of attitude toward military selection was made no less than forty-five years ago! This, however, does not prevent our Chicago contemporary, Unity, from opening a paragraph on what it calls a "pathetic indication of the limitations of the human mind" with the words: "And now Ernst Haeckel eliminates from his great 'History of Creation' his denunciation of war." Now was 1872.

In the edition of Haeckel's great work, translated by E. Ray Lankester and published in this country by the Appletons in 1876, these observations on militarism are found (vol. i, p. 171-2):

"Unfortunately, in our day, militarism is more than ever prominent in our so-called 'civilization'; all the strength and all the wealth of flourishing civilized states are squandered on its development; whereas the education of the young, and public instruction, which are the foundations of the true welfare of nations and the ennobling of humanity, are neglected and mismanaged in a most pitiable manner. And this is done in states which believe themselves to be the privileged leaders of the highest human intelligence, and to stand at the head of civilization. As is well known, in order to increase the standing army as much as possible, all healthy and strong young men are annually selected by a strict system of recruiting. The stronger, healthier, and more spirited a youth is, the greater is his prospect of being killed by needle-guns, cannons, and other similar instruments of civilization. All youths that are unhealthy, weak, or affected with infirmities, on the other hand, are spared by the 'military selection,' and remain at home during the war, marry, and propagate themselves. The more useless, the weaker or infirmer the youth is, the greater is his prospect of escaping the recruiting officer and of founding a family. While the healthy flower of youth dies on the battle-field, the feeble remainder enjoy the satisfaction of reproduction and of transmitting all their weaknesses and infirmities to their descendants. According to the laws of transmission by inheritance, there must necessarily follow in each succeeding generation, not only a further extension, but also a more deeply-seated development of weakness of body, and what is inseparable from it, a condition of mental weakness also. This and other forms of artificial selection practiced in our civilized states sufficiently explain the sad fact that, in reality, weakness of the body and weakness of character are on the perpetual increase among civilized nations, and that, together with strong, healthy bodies, free and independent spirits are becoming more and more scarce."

Very little knowledge of the laws of hereditary transmission is required to recognize that the foregoing statement, which in later editions of the "History of Creation" is said to be replaced with passages condemning "clerical selection," is as true in the organic world as were the teachings of Galileo in the inorganic; and the supposition is justified that the influences which led to its suppression were the moral or political counterpart of those which led Galileo to make his famous abjuration of the revolution of the earth about the sun. It is conceded now on all hands that military selection sacrifices those whom Haeckel termed "the stronger, healthier and more spirited" among our youth and meanwhile leaves the perpetuation of the race to the physically unfit. If the alleged expurgation was not the result of pressure brought to bear upon the author, the alternative explanation is that the truths stated are so obvious that they do not need longer to be stated. It cannot be possible that Haeckel has been converted from the view expressed to one that approves of military selection—the exposure of the best physical specimens of the race to the chance of extermination by "needle-guns, cannons and other similar instruments of civilization." But if the conversion has taken place, as does not yet appear, it is a matter of two score and five years ago.

The Utility of Immortality.

It is not an ordinary occurrence for one to inquire concerning the utility of a spiritual gift, but when theological concepts are offered with the certainty peculiar to natural facts whose usefulness is a matter of daily experience, it is altogether proper to expect an element of utility in those supernatural conditions which are generally recognized as associated with religion.

One reason assigned for the utility of immortality is that it secures for man perfect justice in a future world—a justice which there seems no hope of obtaining here. This other-world justice finds its ultimate expression in an eternal heaven for the righteous, and an eternal hell for the wicked. Now does this truly express the intelligent man's highest ideal of justice? Is there any human being on the face of the earth anywhere that desires for his worst enemy an eternity of torture in a fire that will never be quenched? Also, is there anyone who desires for his most devoted friend such a heaven of eternity as is described in the book of Revelation? Every man knows from personal experience that no one was ever bad enough to deserve hell, and no one was ever good enough to merit heaven. After all has been said, it is not justice that men so much desire as happiness; and if this could be ultimately secured for all, men would cease to question the justice of God. From the standpoint of justice, then, there is no utility in immortality, for a justice that is inherently contradictory of man's highest ideals can serve no purpose in the existence of man, and can call forth from his heart no expression of love and gratitude.

But we are reminded, as a further reason for the utility of immortality, that it acts as a safeguard of morality; that were the thought of a future life removed from human society, utter pessimism and moral decay would immediately follow. But is not this the mere conjecture of religionists? Men's actions in this world have never been controlled by the thought that there was a future life in store for them. There is probably no element of influence that enters so little into the course of human activity as that of the soul's immortality. The uncertainty that has always accompanied the belief has robbed it of any potentiality it might otherwise have possessed. As a check to wrong-doing it has been practically devoid of all usefulness. From this point of view it might be dismissed at once from man's consideration without his experiencing any sense of loss. "It is a noteworthy indication of the course of human development that the higher intellectual and moral level attained, the less does the influence of personal immortality upon conduct make itself felt."

The reason that has most influenced mankind for the utility of immortality is the hope that many entertain of meeting again in a joyful reunion their relatives and friends who have passed from this present life. Such persons strongly think that man with his splendid qualities of mind and heart would never have been created if his life was to end with his earthly career. They think that the wisdom of the universe can only be vindicated by conceding to man a perpetuity of existence beyond the life which now is. This view plainly tends to magnify the pre-eminence of man, and the august splendor of the universe. But if immortality be a fact, may it not be an immortality of the race rather than an immortality of the individual? It is obvious, however, that this reason is suggested by the human heart rather than by the mind of man; and the moment such a subject is taken out of the category of reason and made the object of sentimentality, it at once exempts itself from a wise and critical consideration, and must be placed among the visions and fancies of an affected sensibility.

We take it for granted that our departed relatives desire a continued life with us in another world; but how can we know this? Many persons in this world dislike the thought of living forever. Their one thought in death is that they may rest in peace. Even the thought of heaven does not move some people; they would prefer to stay here. Again there are those who are quite indifferent to the prospects of a future life, and who, in some instances, view the idea as a morally inferior belief. The feeling, therefore, that is awakened in the nature at the death of a beloved son or daughter—a feeling of immortality which we had never experienced before—can not be looked upon as in any sense an argument for a future life, or an evidence of its utility. Its basis is pure human love and sentiment, which are most admirable for the preservation of happy relationships in this world, but have little or no value for the interpreting of the conditions which lie beyond life. We are therefore led to this conclusion, that neither from a sense of justice, nor the need of an ethical sanction, nor the yearnings of the heart for the continuance of the ties of love and friendship, can personal immortality be contemplated as a desirable state. Things are valued by virtue of their utility: the utility of personal immortality has never yet been demonstrated.

Professor Bacon Did Not Say It.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 13 there was reproduced from a New York daily newspaper what purported to be the report of an address by Prof. Benjamin W. Bacon of Yale University, at Haverford College, Philadelphia, December 28, on "the quotation from Matthew i, 23: Behold a virgin shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel." In this report, which was shrewdly commented upon by Cyrus W. Coolidge, a contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Professor Bacon was represented as affirming that the Matthew story of the virgin birth was a forgery, interpolated by Bible editors with more of a desire to write a good story than to arrive at the truth; and that original manuscripts of the Bible contained no foundation for belief in the virgin birth.

The statement aroused the curiosity of Gilbert G. Ogden, Esq., of Chicago, who wrote to Professor Bacon to inquire where and when he might see the "original manuscript of the Bible" to which reference had been made. He received the following reply:

"NEW HAVEN, CONN., Jan. 15, 1917.

"MR. GILBERT G. OGDEN—Dear Sir: It is gratifying to observe that you perceive at once the absurdity of the statement attributed in the press to me, that I had 'examined the original manuscript of the Bible,' etc., etc., ad nauseam. It is less gratifying to have another evidence how hopelessly the official denial of the eminent Prof. Morris K. Jastrow, president of the society before which the paper was read, that I made any statement remotely resembling this preposterous assertion, or in fact discussed the Virgin Birth at all, lags behind the sensational misreport. If you refer to Professor Jastrow's report, published without communication to or from me in the Philadelphia Public Ledger of Jan. 2 (?), you will realize with greater clearness than before that if you see it in the press (unless it be the very exceptional press) it is generally not so. I am hoping soon for opportunity to inform the public through non-sensational channels what I really did say. Meantime anything you can do to aid Prof. Jastrow's denial to overtake the gross and grotesque misstatements in the press will be greatly appreciated by, Your obedient servant,

"BENJ. W. BACON."

We have first to disclaim on behalf of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its contributor any thought of misrepresenting Professor Bacon's statements. The reprint followed the daily paper's version, which justified the appended comment. The suspicious part of the report was that which quoted the professor as dealing with the contents of "original manuscripts of the Bible," of which, it is well known, there are none in existence; but for "original manuscripts" read "earlier versions," and what he is reported to have said about the virgin birth would be true enough. What astonished Mr. Coolidge was not the information imparted, but the candor of Professor Bacon in giving it away. The virgin birth story is absent from the Mark gospel, supposed to be the oldest, and according to the best criticism was interpolated in the other synoptics by a redactor.

Book Notes.

After a consideration of the problem of the existence of God, there follows, in the logical mind, a desire to understand the grounds for the continuance of human life after death, or what is known as the doctrine of immortality. The effort to explain this doctrine reasonably has been a continuous one from the earliest ages until today. Notwithstanding all that has been written upon the subject, we find a large part of mankind still hungering for an exposition of the belief, its origin, nature and function, such as will bring conviction to the sincere inquirer, either for or against its truthfulness.

The writer of this note is strongly of the opinion that the long-looked-for elucidation of this puzzling matter is now given to the world in the learned work of Prof. James H. Leuba of Bryn Mawr College, Pa., called "The Belief in God and Immortality: A Psychological, Anthropological and Statistical Study." Professor Leuba is a psychologist of recognized authority, and well equipped at every point to present the latest information to be gathered on the subject.

He divides his book into three parts, in all of which the argument is so well-sustained and convincing that each part may be read separately without encroaching or depending upon the information given in other parts. In the first part the author treats of the two conceptions of immortality, their different characteristics, and the attempted demonstration of the truth of the modern conception. It is known to few persons that the origin of the primitive conception of immortality is very different from that which gives meaning to the modern belief. Professor Leuba shows that the grounds for the earlier belief and the modern one are by no means the same; that the modern conception is not a growth from the primary belief, but an independent creation, differing radically from it in every particular. "Whereas the primary belief was forced upon men irrespective of their wishes as an unavoidable interpretation of certain patent facts (chiefly the apparition of deceased persons in dreams and in visions), the modern belief was born of a desire for the realization of ideals." This argument is very interesting, and as we have said, will prove new to many persons who hitherto considered themselves well informed on the subject.

The second part of the author's work presents a statistical study of the belief in a personal God and in personal immortality in the United States. To many persons this portion of the book will prove to be of the greatest possible interest. The inquiries made by Professor Leuba among college students, physical scientists, biologists, historians, sociologists, economists, and psychologists have yielded fruit of considerable significance. Prior to the appearance of this work, many entertained the opinion that the great majority of scientists and other learned men in the United States were more or less firm believers in the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. That notion is now utterly disproved. The learned author has worked out this part of his subject with great care and exactness, and he expresses the hope "that despite the widespread and, I must admit, on the whole justifiable distrust of statistics of belief, no reader will pass a summary judgment upon mine until he has examined them with some care."

In the third part the author presents "certain facts and considerations bearing upon the present utility of the beliefs in a personal God and in immortality, from which it appears that, so far at least as the United States and other equally civilized countries are concerned, the enormous practical importance customarily ascribed to these beliefs no longer corresponds to the reality." In the neglect of this belief he shows what the real losses would be, and whether they might be compensated for or even turned to gain. On the whole we consider this new work of the Bryn Mawr professor not only very interesting but highly valuable; so much so that no one can afford to be without it who wishes a thoroughly up-to-date treatment of the greatest subjects that can engage the speculative attention of thoughtful men—God and Immortality. Price, $2; to be obtained of the Truth Seeker Company.

Missionary Editor's Notes.

Extracts from Correspondence.

To an offer to send him certain Freethought works, provided he would read and review or purchase or return them, Professor Husband of Dartmouth replied as follows: "The Bible is the record of the greatest religious movement in history, and was written by men in sympathy with that movement. But the writers were men untrained in critical methods, and of uncritical minds. Hence they have given us a picture which must be examined with all the acumen we devote to other works of either ancient or modern times.

"Fortunately my legal study of the trial of Jesus did not lead me into the terrible question of the supernatural. I can merely say that the supernatural has long ceased to be a vital part of my religious feelings. . . . So long as my views are unsettled I shall be interested in Freethought and in any other source of help, but I have not happened to see any of the Truth Seeker's books."

This frank answer entitles him to copies of books on approval.

On Dec. 26, we wrote to President Hibben of Princeton as follows: "An alumnus of Princeton has authorized us to offer the University the sum of $200 to defray the expense of a few lectures, open to all classes, and perhaps to others, on the critical study of the Bible. Believing that the most concise exposition of adverse criticism of scripture is contained in John E. Remsburg's 'The Bible' and 'The Christ,' it is suggested that the lectures be based on these and 'Bible Myths' by Doane. There is no stipulation that the lecturer shall be in sympathy with Freethought, and any fair-minded man, approved by you, will be acceptable; for the only desire is to make known facts concerning the origin and contents of the Bible in order that each person may determine whether or not its authenticity and morality confirm the tradition that it is the word of God. Your remarks at the opening of college, in which you advise 'an eager disposition not only to know, but to know at first hand and to seek truth at its source,' lead one to infer that you believe truth to be essential, and will therefore welcome any truth that can be well established. If the trustees are willing to accept this gift, a check will be forwarded."

On Dec. 28 President Hibben replied: "I have received your letter and appreciate exceedingly your kind offer . . . to defray the expenses of lectures upon the critical study of the Bible. The Board of Trustees two years ago established such a lectureship in Princeton. . . . The course for this year has just been given the latter part of November by President Falconer of Toronto University and I feel that it would not be wise to institute an additional course of the same character. Appreciating your kindly courtesy and thought of Princeton, believe me, Sincerely yours,

"JOHN GRIER HIBBEN."

He received a free copy of the "Age of Reason" and another letter.

A newspaper correspondent has moved the Washington Times to a consideration of the question of church taxation. The correspondent points out that "the exemption of church property from taxation is a denial of the fundamental truths of democratic government"; that "talk of the ethical and educational attributes claimed for the church is wholly beside the question"; that "it is not the business of the state to raise its revenues only from the baser elements of the population"; that "as its private citizens do not pay taxes in proportion to their lack of virtuous qualities, so neither should the institutions which enjoy state protection"; and that "our great philanthropists, scientists, inventors, and educators are not exempt from taxation on the ground of the great good they are doing." The Times estimates that the value of church holdings in the United States "amounts now to something like two billion dollars, and in the present straitened circumstances of the country the authorities may be compelled to this new source for temporary relief." If the estimate is not too high, as it probably is not, church taxation would yield a revenue of forty millions a year.

The Progressive Thinker (Spiritualist, Chicago) rejoices in the news from Boston that a verdict has been rendered sustaining a Spiritualist meeting as a religious service.

THE BRIEF FOR FREE SPEECH.

The Blasphemy Argument Brings Up the History of Toleration in New York.

By THEODORE SCHROEDER.

The next person whom I will quote is the Rev. Joseph Fownes, as to whom little seems to be known. His book "An Enquiry Into the Principles of Toleration," was published in the second edition in England in 1773. The first edition was published anonymously. In the catalogue of the library of the British Museum, it appears that he also published several items under the pseudonym of "Phileleutheros." Notwithstanding such literary prominence his name does not appear among collections of English biographies which I have examined. I suspect the explanation for this absence of information is to be found in his coming to America. Some time about 1810 there appeared in Boston a pamphlet entitled "A Blow at the Root of Aristocracy, or an Appeal to Matters of Fact, in Support of Religious Freedom," and signed "Phileleutheros." Insofar as this speculation identifies Joseph Fownes with agitation for intellectual freedom in America, his opinions acquire an added force as a factor in construing our constitutional guarantees. This first book was in part inspired by Blackstone, and definitely took issue with his conception of intellectual liberty. In the second edition, 1773, page 18, of "An Enquiry Into the Principles of Toleration," he answers an objection such as doubtless had been made often, and must have been in the minds of those who framed the Constitution of Connecticut. He says:

"Religion, it will be urged, may be made a plea for anything; and if governors must never interpose to restrain it, there is no enormity but what will pass unpunished."

Then he goes on to explain away the fear by calling attention to the same old line between actual injury and constructive injury. The Supreme Court of the United States answers the same contention as to Mormon Polygamists, in U. S. v. Reynolds, 98 U. S. 163. That Court, by following Jefferson and the Virginia Act of Toleration, in fixing the limits of intellectual liberty, reaches the same conclusion as Furneaux, Fownes, Milton, Bentham, and the rest. The makers of the Connecticut Constitution were unwilling to leave it to future construction, such as was made in the Reynolds case, and so sought to compel the same construction by appropriate words, answering to the fears of the people.

Fownes explaining (in an Appendix, p. 114) says: "The instances in which this inconvenience may be supposed to arise from liberty of conscience may, I presume, be generally reduced to one of these cases: The case of persons who think themselves bound to use force for the propagation of what they apprehend to be the truth. The case of those, whose principles lead them to judge, what are commonly thought vices hurtful to society, to be innocent, and what may be indulged without scruple. Or lastly, the cases of those who are so unhappily misled as to incorporate things hurtful to society into their religion and account it their duty to practice them." He shows that the principles of toleration and religious freedom neither lead to these evils nor take away the power of the magistrate to restrain them, insofar as they are real and not imaginary or merely psychologic.

To the first he answers: "Every attack which he makes upon their person, liberty or estate, for this purpose, is an injury, which comes within the limits of the civil power." To the second he answers that: "Fraud, robbery, perjury, and other crimes of the like nature, are directly repugnant to all the essentials and acquired rights of man." Manifestly, he is writing of property rights. To the third he answers thus: "If his judgment should unhappily lead him to make anything a part of his religion which is injurious to others, and contrary to the fundamental laws of society, he so far still falls under the animadversion of the magistrate. . . . He acts not as the dictator to his subjects, but as the guardian of their temporalities. . . . By attending to this obvious distinction, the rights of conscience and the real rights of government will both be preserved, and the pernicious extremes of calling either in question will be avoided. Religious liberty will be kept from running into licentiousness; civil authority will be preserved from degenerating into tyranny" (pp. 116-117).

This, it is hoped, makes clear the issue between Blackstone and his critics. Governments that abridge intellectual liberty always make the same justification as Blackstone did. That is, the dominant class wish to be relieved of the annoyance and disturbance of their mental peace, such as is incidental to having the wisdom and justice of their dominance questioned. That, and not a longing for truth or justice, is the real motive for punishing "dangerous and offensive writings." When the danger has become realized in overt acts injurious to person or property, the purveyor of such dangerous ideas becomes liable, as an accessory before the fact of some other crime, or perhaps more directly liable as in personal libel. In such cases there is no need to resort to speculations about the psychologic tendency, because the actual and material injury is capable of direct proof.

The foregoing quotations from Blackstone's critics make it plain that they insisted that the state was without jurisdiction until the "dangerous and pernicious tendency" eventuated in an overt act, which is actually and materially, not speculatively and psychologically, dangerous to person or property according to the known laws of the physical universe. In other words, the real motive of Blackstone's critics was to eliminate from the laws all metaphysical speculation about the unrealized psychologic tendency of an idea or of any literary or oratorical style, upon some hypothetical hearer or reader of the future. This elimination of mystery from the law was demanded both in the excuse for a state that was certain, and in the uncertain criteria of guilt. For these critics of Blackstone, this elimination was the essence of mental freedom as to religion. Later we shall see that this was also the essence of the historic controversies for religious liberty.

The Ruggles Case and New York Procedure.

Every attempt to defend the constitutionality of blasphemy laws will necessarily depend in some measure upon the New York decision of 1811, in the case of People v. Ruggles, 8 Johnson 290; 5 Amer. Dec. 335. In order to secure a more open-minded attitude, it becomes necessary to question the reasoning and the authority of that decision. To this end we will proceed to a critical review of it. This is done in the confidence that it will appear that the Ruggles decision expressed a misconception of the law at the time of its rendition, and that since then it has been overruled both as to its essential reasoning and its conclusions.

A careful and critical review of the English decisions in blasphemy cases shows that they were essentially based on the English conception of the State and the Church as but different aspects of the same human institution. Many times, in giving their reasons for the blasphemy laws, the English courts have repeated Lord Hale's statement that "the Christian religion is part of the law itself." Coke reports that "words against an archbishop are words against the government," and punishable as treason.

In contradiction of much more of this, Justice Kent in the Ruggles case declared of blasphemy that "such offenses have always been considered independent of any religious establishment or the right of the church." That he should thus ignore what would seem to be patent facts to most men of our time suggests that this statement was the result of an overwhelming impulse in Judge Kent to explain away the influence of the New York constitutional provisions against a union of church and state and for tolerance.

If by the above statement Justice Kent had meant only to convey the idea that the essential motive for blasphemy laws was a protection for royalty and aristocracy in the continued enjoyment of privileges and prerogatives, then the statement has some truth in it, but loses its importance. Even though in this light the protection of the church was not an end in itself, it became an essential objective means for the accomplishment of the royalists' political desire. An inseparable part of the program was the protection of the "rights" of the church as embodied in the privileges of the "spiritual" aristocracy, such as "benefit of clergy," state support, etc. In return, these supported the king and the temporal aristocrats. The consequence of so using the church and its ecclesiastical machinery always has been to bring into being the substance of a legally established church organization and an official theology. The mode of its verbal acknowledgment is unimportant. In the light of this, Justice Kent's statement becomes a mere verbalism, void of essential truth.

In the same opinion, Justice Kent practically admits the error of the statement already quoted, when he says: "The very idea of jurisprudence with the ancient law-givers and philosophers embraced the religion of the country." There we have it in a nutshell. There never has been a government which had a complete separation from religion. Even in America, the present separation is complete only in theory, not in practice. In most countries the word "church" symbolizes one aspect, the word "state" another aspect, of the same thing. The distinction is rhetorical only, and blasphemy laws are but one manifestation of a religion which is in fact more or less completely and legally established. It would seem to follow that, when the constitution prohibits a union of church and state, it thereby prohibits the punishment of blasphemy.

Colonial New York and Tolerance.

Let us now examine into the growth of intellectual hospitality during New York's Colonial period. It is highly probable that this will shed some light on the correctness of the constitutional interpretation which was undertaken by Justice Kent in the Ruggles case. It is a little singular that he should have ignored the developments which led up to the adoption of the constitutional provisions separating church and State, because a consideration of the antecedent and contemporary historical events have always been considered essential factors to statutory and constitutional construction.

The first mention of toleration that I have found is contained in the Articles of Capitulation by the Dutch to the English, dated August 27, 1664. Article 8 declares that "the Dutch here shall enjoy the liberty of conscience in Divine worship and Church Discipline." To be sure, this is a very narrow limit of toleration, both as to persons and subject matter. Subsequent references in the laws lead me to believe that "liberty of conscience in Divine Worship and Church Discipline" were meant to include the use of the taxing power for the support of the Dutch clergy and such privileges as had been enjoyed by them as the official Dutch church. The seed of tolerance being once planted, subsequent agitation and the blood of martyrs would compel its growth.

The second official recognition of any toleration is to be found in "The Charter of Liberties and Privileges Granted by His Royal Highness [Charles II] to the Inhabitants of New York and its Dependencies." (Passed October 30, 1683, by the Govern'r, Council, and the Representatives in General Assembly.) This Bill of Rights is quite comprehensive, and was passed "that Justice and Right may be equally done to all persons." Among other important matters, it contains this:

"No person or persons which professes faith in God by Jesus Christ, shall at any time, be any ways molested, punished, disquieted, or called in question for any difference in opinion on matter of religious concernment, who do not actually disturb the civil peace of the province, but that all and every person or persons may, from time to time, and at all times, freely have, and fully enjoy, his or their judgments, or consciences, in matters of religion throughout all the province, they behaving themselves peaceably and quietly, and not using the liberty to licentiousness nor to the civil injury or outward disturbance of others. Provided always, That this liberty or anything conveyed therein to the contrary shall never be construed or improved to make void the settlement of any public minister on Long Island."

"And whereas all the respective Christian Churches now in practice within the City of New York and the other places of this province do appear to be privileged, and have been so established and confirmed by the former authority of this government, be it hereby enacted by this present General Assembly, and by the authority thereof, that all the said respective Christian churches be hereby confirmed therein, and that they and every of them shall from henceforth for ever be held and reputed as privileged churches, and enjoy all their former freedoms of their religion in divine worship and church discipline, and that all former contracts made and agreed on for the maintenances [be upheld] . . . Provided also that all other Christian churches that shall hereafter come and settle within this province, shall have the same privileges." (Laws of New York, revision of 1813, vol. 2, Appendix, p. v-vi.)

If we view this language in the light of the preceding treaty, its purpose is plain. The treaty with Holland had evidently continued undisturbed the privileges of the Dutch church and its clergy and members. This act of the Assembly was manifestly an effort to destroy the relative privilege of the Dutch religionists without violating the Articles of Capitulation. This was done by the simple expedient of elevating all other churches to the same degree of privilege. That is to say, the same degree of toleration and state recognition or support, which by treaty had been insured to the Dutch, was now made the heritage of all Christians.

It is important to note here that this official concession under authority of English royalty amends the common law as to blasphemy so as to make the limit of religious toleration, as between varying groups of Christians, to consist of an actual breach of the civil peace, instead of a speculative tendency founded upon a breach of the spiritual or religious peace. Now there could no longer be punishment as at common law for disagreement on biblical interpretation. While narrowing the scope, the language follows the essential part of the Rhode Island act of toleration of 1664. In the phraseology of our time, it is the difference between an actual breach of the peace, and a constructive breach of the peace, which latter is always based upon a mere speculation as to a psychologic tendency. Insofar as the common law based criminality for intellectual offenses upon psychologic tendency only speculatively ascertained, this enactment was a beneficial modification thereof.

The third enactment affecting religious freedom was passed by the General Assembly of the Colony of New York, May 13, 1691. It is entitled: "An Act Declaring what are the Rights and Privileges of Their Majesties' Subjects Inhabiting within Their Province of New York." On the subject of religion we find this declaration:

"No person or persons which profess faith in God by Jesus Christ His Only Son shall at any time be any ways molested, punished, disturbed, disquieted, or called in question for any Difference in Opinion or matters of conscience in Religious Concernment, who do not, under that pretence, disturb the civil peace of the Province. And that all and every such person and persons may from time to time and at all times hereinafter freely and fully enjoy his or their Opinion, Persuasion, Judgments, in matters of conscience and religion thro-out all this Province, and freely meet at convenient places within this Province, and there worship according to their respective Persuasions without being hindered or molested, they behaving themselves peaceably, quietly, modestly and religiously, and not using this liberty to licentiousness nor to the civil injury or outward disturbance of others. Always Provided, that nothing herein mentioned nor contained shall extend to give liberty to any persons of the Romish Religion to exercise their manner of worship contrary to the laws and statutes of Their Majesties' Kingdom of England." (Acts of Assembly Passed in the Province of New York from 1691-1725, p. 5; Bradford, printer, 1726.)

William Smith (History of New York, p. 127, A. D. 1814) informs us that this enactment was designed as a declaration that the Colonists repudiated the idea that they held their rights of representation in the Assembly as a liberty by permission of the Crown. By their act they meant to affirm that this right and others were inherent in them as men. In 1697, William made his contrary claim by repealing the Declaration of Rights of 1691.

Waiving the questions involved as to any change of rights affected hereby, we may concern ourselves again with the important fact that here the Colonists a second time registered their aversion to constructive or psychologic breaches of the peace. More clearly than in the previous charter, they insisted upon liberty, and not mere toleration, up to the point of an actual resultant breach of the peace. This officially expressed opinion should be of importance as registering in New York the acceptance of a change of opinion as to tolerance that was taking place among all English-speaking peoples. This conception had its first effective advocate in John Milton. Briefly expressed, that change was a growth toward a tolerance of all intellectual differences, short of their actually having produced material injury. Those wishing to attain an intelligent opinion as to the meaning of our constitutional guarantees of freedom will not exclude from their consideration or understanding those previous changes and expressions of public sentiment which finally were recorded in our written constitutional guarantees of liberty. We best understand their meaning by knowing the trend of thought of which they were the culmination and that against which they were aimed. In this view we will see also a growth from mere tolerance to a conceded claim of irrevocable right.

Under the influence of the conflict with the Crown, there came another important decision about tolerance in connection with an election contest about 1736. Here the General Assembly decided that Jews could not vote for Representatives, nor be permitted as witnesses touching any contested elections. (Smith's Hist. of New York, p. 423, A. D. 1814.) Jews and Catholics still suffered disadvantages, which the subsequent Constitution removed, not to produce a return to common law conditions, but to liberalize the common law by bringing all up to the level of equality of tolerance with the formerly favored Protestant sects, who were punishable only for an actual breach of the peace. Thus tolerance was to evolve to religious liberty. (To be continued)

Reflections of a Lost Soul.

"Lost Souls!" What a hubbub about lost souls! These evangelistic "soul-savers" in the midst of us speak of souls as if they were nickel-pieces—things that can be lost and found again. God is referred to as if he were a next-door neighbor; religion is but a fire escape, and Christ a first-class insurance policy. To listen to Evangelist Beiderwolf, a cheap imitation of Billy Sunday, holding forth nightly in Salt Lake on the need of salvation, is to risk losing ones self-respect. Ones mental balance is endangered. One thing is certain: Beiderwolf, like Sunday, is short on biology, psychology and sociology. Living in the twentieth century, he babbles and prattles the irrational beliefs and traditions of the fifteenth. Of course, this should not surprise us; you know it takes the average theologian about two hundred years to appreciate the bearing of a fact.

The other night, our visting evangelist, Mr. Beiderwolf, declaimed against "Infidels," "heretics" and "scoffers"—"lost souls" every one of them. "Unbelievers" are "lost, lost!" What a tyranny of words! How language suffers when handled by your theological buffoons and heavenly hucksters! Mr. Beiderwolf's audiences do not talk back; they are not even permitted to "heckel" the speaker. This is unfortunate. May a "lost soul" answer him in print? I should like him to know something of the beliefs of at least one of us. Viewing life from the standpoint of evolution, we find man, never having "fallen," never has been "lost," is not "lost" now and is therefore in no need of salvation; does not need to be "saved." Man needs not salvation, but sanity; he needs to be made sane, not "saved." Hell and heaven are childish terms meaning nothing to thoughtful men. If Mr. Beiderwolf wants to know how man came by his "God" ideas and so-called "religious instincts," the reply of a "lost soul" is: Man came by his religious ideas just as he came by his political, social and scientific ideas—through study and experience. That's why we have so many foolish ideas today; they were born in the heads of such men as our esteemed religious doctor. God, from all accounts, has been at no more pains to teach a correct theology than a correct astronomy, or a correct sociology. Man began his career in total ignorance and had everything to learn for himself on all subjects. He is at liberty to find out about the "other world" just as he is at liberty to find out this one.

One reason for man's slow advancement is that he has, at the behest of priests, ever busied himself with supernatural concerns, and in his anxiety for another world has sadly neglected this. In his efforts to please God, he has forgotten his neighbor. While centering his attention on heavenly mansions, his pockets have been rifled. Gazing steadily at the stars, you are in danger of stumbling over molehills. A "lost soul"—and there are many in Salt Lake—have read a little history, and thus they have learned that the centers of theology have ever been the radiators of darkness. Where theology was most powerful men were most cruel and most immoral. As the savior of human society in this world, the church was an infinite failure. Now, as then, where theology dominates, where knowledge of God is considered more important than the study of man, of society, there you will find injustice, ignorance and slavery.

The other night Beiderwolf told a story to illustrate his God's fine sense of a square deal: "An artist seeing a poverty-stricken wretch in a London slum, dirty and vile looking, threw him a sovereign, saying, 'Come to my studio so I may paint your picture.' The slum-dweller appeared before the artist, clean and better dressed. 'I did not want you in that dress,' said the artist, 'but as you were, dirty and ragged.' So with God; he wants you, not clean but dirty; no matter how sin-stained your soul may be; he is ready to save you. 'Saved in the blood of the lamb!' This is Christian ethics; this is Christianity's message, preached to multitudes in 1916. Need one wonder at the low morale of the Christian nations of Europe and America? If fate decrees that I, a 'lost soul,' see God 'face to face,' I shall first take a bath. Godliness is next to cleanliness. A dirty saint is a monstrosity. Beiderwolf is also shocked at some nude pictures now being exhibited on a movie screen. How comes it these holy men, being pure themselves, see so much impurity in the nude? The pictures referred to are wholesome and elevating to any one not 'God-intoxicated.' The whole trouble with these men of God is that they 'do not walk the streets of the city of life—they explore the sewers; they stand in the gutters and cry 'unclean.'"

Should Mr. Beiderwolf ask: "What has a 'lost soul' to give in place of that which he seeks to destroy?" the answer is at hand. The so-called "lost souls," instead of mooning over a distant heaven or fearing a future hell, have turned their attention to this old, very-much-abused world. They have concluded that to-morrow may look out for itself, while we live our life today. He will postpone the joys of a fictitious heaven, and try to extract a little pleasure out of these passing scenes. One world at a time. One is about as much as some of us can stand. We will not anticipate the sufferings of hell while so many hells, domestic and economic, abound here. We think physiology as important for boys and girls as the catechism or the Apostles' Creed; that to be kind to your neighbor is more necessary than to love God; that a good, clean home, where love is, is more sacred than chapel or cathedral. To keep your honest word is better far than to keep Lent. We need not fear any offense to the saints in the calendar—provided we are busy making ourselves a little more saintly. Whether we shall know each other in heaven is problematical; what we ask for is such conduct that we shall not be ashamed to know each other here.

Instead of serving an unseen deity—an absentee-landlord—and striving to reach an unknown heaven, let us plead the things we are sure of; let us live the things we know. Let theology go; seek justice and right and truth. Advocate a taxation which takes money from the rich, not bread from the very poor; legislate in favor of the weak and not to favor the fortunate; let us have knowledge that leads to sane thinking and decent living; schools that encourage honesty and freedom of speech; give us governments, state and national, with brains enough in them and humanity enough, to keep children out of factories and keep them in school. Let there be a popular demand that newspapers and drinking water alike be clear of sewage. Instead of theology—a knowledge of God—give us sociology, a knowledge of society, of men and women.

Even though we be "lost" and a trifle ungodly, let us be fair, square and decent, neighbor to neighbor. When we have these things secured, it will be time, if ever, for the thousands of priests and preachers to give fifty Sundays of the fifty-two in every year to a consideration of life in some other world.

Seek ye first the purities and decencies of earth, and many blessings shall be yours. We work for that which "tends to develop the bodies and minds of men," said that great lover of men, Robert G. Ingersoll. "All that gives us better houses, better clothes, better food, better pictures, better literature, grander music; all that renders us more intellectual and more loving, nearer just; that makes us better neighbors, better citizens—all these things combined produce what I call progress." No Christian heaven could equal such an earth with such humanity! This is the heaven, the ideal of earth's best and bravest; surely it is an ideal worth striving for, working for, and, if need be, dying for! A "race without disease of flesh or brain, shapely and fair, the married harmony of form and function." The Christian's heaven is a very cheap affair compared to the "lost soul's" "earthly paradise."

The big and chief indictment we bring against the organized church and such men as evangelist Beiderwolf is that preaching theology they neglect sociology, the great need of the age; and while the church has not taught "war" directly, it has encouraged war indirectly. By withholding scientific and economic knowledge from the people under its care, it has aided and abetted the military class, and the industrial exploiters who, at all times, rely on the ignorant man to do their dirty work. Ignorance is slavery.

I would rather be a "lost soul" with an earthly hope than a "saved" Christian and a hope of heaven.

Thoughts on Paine Day.

We sometimes wonder why it is that people celebrate their progress and the birthdays of their great men by eating and drinking. Buckle, in his "History of Civilization," observes that "two great principles which rule the world are the love of wealth and the love of knowledge." The history of civilization is the history of man's struggles to satisfy his appetites—the appetite of the body and the mind, his hunger for food and his hunger for knowledge of the forces which surrounded him. The conservative is the man or woman who is filled, satisfied in body and mind. The revolutionist is the man or woman who is hungry in body or mind, hungry for better things for the children of men.

The conservative is the man who thinks that conditions are good enough—who is satisfied with the religion of his mother and the politics of his father. The conservative is like the man out West who was asked whether he was going to vote for the law which would abolish hanging, and replied: "No, hanging was good enough for my father and it is good enough for me."

It is fitting that we should celebrate the birthday of Thomas Paine. He was one of those revolutionists, one of those enthusiasts, who did not think that things were good enough. He was one of those heroes, those maligned men, who, like Prometheus, have stolen fire from the gods and given it to the sons of men, and upon whose reputations the vultures feed. He desired to improve conditions, and as in the Greek fable Minerva, the goddess of Wisdom, sprang from the brain of Jove, so did this Great Republic spring from the mind of Thomas Paine, with many wise ideas for the betterment of the world that are agitated by present-day reformers. He advocated the rights of man upon every occasion, not forgetting the rights of women.

And in speaking of the rights of women we are reminded of the very worthy Cardinal Gibbons, who so recently warned us that woman suffrage would rob women of their grace of character. Think of it—the representative of the church, the Catholic church, that claims to be democratic, that claims to practice equality, opposing ideas that are self-evident truths to every thinking man and woman. If this is Catholic democracy, if this is Catholic equality, then I am sure that the average believer in democracy and equality feels like the good bishop who was asked to have a drink and who, when asked why he refused, replied: "Well, in the first place, I have just joined a temperance society; in the second place, I am about to enter a church to deliver a sermon, and, in the third place, I have just had one." We do not want any more of that kind of democracy and equality; we have just had some.

In spite of the fact that the church has opposed nearly every progressive movement in the world; we hear a great many political and social reformers insist (in order to gain converts) that their particular economic or political creed has nothing whatever to do with religion. The scientist of the middle ages might have said the same thing—that his idea had nothing whatever to do with religion; but religion had a great deal to do with the scientist in those days, and the reformers of today forget that the church has a great deal to do with them, because religion and the church cause the people to be prejudiced against the changes which they advocate.

These reformers have much to learn from Thomas Paine, who saw that if a democracy is to endure, the people must be intelligent, that ignorance is the foe of progress, that superstition is the monster that stands across the path of man; and after Paine had grown old in the fight for political and economic freedom, after he had written the "Rights of Man," he saw that it was useless to free men from the tyrants of the earth if they were to remain the slaves of the imaginary monsters of the air; he saw that intellectual freedom is necessary, that reason and intelligence must precede justice and equality, and in order to hasten the coming of the better day he wrote the "Age of Reason."

Paine Letters Sold.

One of the disputed and still unsettled events in history in which Thomas Paine figured was what was known as the Dean affair, in which Silas Dean attempted to defraud the United States out of $1,500,000, claiming that the money given by Louis XVI of France was a loan. Dean was exposed by Paine, who in doing so lost his position as secretary of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but prevented his country's being defrauded. Paine had conducted and received all the correspondence of the committee.

The Robert Morris papers, which were the confidential letters received by him as the financier of the American Revolution, were recently sold in Philadelphia. One of the letters of Morris states: "Dean has played egregiously, to say no worse. Such conduct as his is ominous to the man himself, and, however unjustly, yet it is of injury to those who have been in his intimacy. I confess that he has astonished me, for I believed him sincerely devoted to his country." This letter was bought by Matthew Ridley, Esq., for $14.

The letter confirms what Robert Morris said to Paine when he assured him that he had been totally deceived by Dean and now looked upon him as a bad man. Gouverneur Morris (Teddy's idol) admitted that they all had been deceived and duped, himself among the rest, and complimented Paine on his quick sight.

There are several letters in the collection of a similar tone, which no doubt Congress had access to at the time; yet in spite of all the facts, Paine was denied a hearing. By resigning he lost his position, but maintained his self-respect.

In 1842 Congress presented Silas Dean's heirs with $35,000. There were several letters to Silas Dean that brought good prices. A very cordial letter of Robert Morris to Paine brought $50. There were several important letters of Thomas Paine in the collection. One was a notice that he had been appointed as chairman of a town meeting to investigate a flour transaction of Robert Morris, wherein Morris was exonerated by the committee, that sold for $75. The report signed by the committee sold for $110.

Another letter of Paine's to Morris, giving the account of his services to America, which should be printed in letters of gold, sold for $210. Still others went for $25 and $110; and lastly, one giving a plan of government that would have delighted our late Brother Wakeman, sold for $190. All went to dealers.

This shows that the name of Thomas Paine will yet figure in American history, and that the work of the Paine Association has not been in vain.

These letters, which have not been published, would have been highly appreciated by Paine's biographer, Dr. M. D. Conway. This being the confidential correspondence of Robert Morris, the letters throw a flood of light not only upon Thomas Paine's work but also upon the enemies of Washington and Morris, and show without a doubt that others wrote letters derogatory to Washington's character. The writer has made many excerpts from the letters, and intends in a future article to expose Oberholtzer's lies about Paine in his work on Robert Morris as a patriot and financier, in which he brands Paine as Morris's enemy.

The "Times" Surprises Us Agreeably.

Last Monday was the 180th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. This year will bring, in June, the 108th anniversary of his death. Meanwhile his resurrection is in progress. Read the following editorial article from the New York Times of January 25, 1917:

"That sincere patriot and more than fairly able publicist and philosopher, at whom so many of us are still inclined to look askance because his enemies succeeded in teaching us to call him Tom instead of Thomas Paine, managed to put in the essays which Washington so cordially admired and gladly used not a few statements that are as relevant to today's events as to those of his own times. In 'Common Sense,' for instance, there is this thought-provoking sentence:

"Monarchical governments, it is true, are never long at rest; the crown itself is a temptation to enterprising ruffians at home; and that degree of pride and insolence ever attendant on regal authority swells into a rupture with foreign powers in instances where a republican government, by being formed on more natural principles, would negotiate the mistake.

These words, naturally enough, reflect world conditions as they then existed, and it was not to be expected that Paine would take into account the possibility of a 'monarchical government' as stable and as democratic, in all except form, as any republic could be. And he did not foresee, either, that there would be republics in which the presidency would be as much of a temptation to 'enterprising ruffians' as ever a crown was or could be. Still, Paine's idea, based on monarchies and democracies accurately so-called, was sound, and the greater probabilities and facilities for the maintenance of peace under the latter than under the former have been persistently demonstrated in all the years since he wrote. He was, in effect, arguing the superiority of governments based on the consent of the governed to those of which the basis was force or an imagined divine right to rule, and, so far as any evidence goes to show, the only excuse for calling him 'a filthy little Atheist' was his denial of reality to that same 'right.' At any rate, he was not little, he was not filthy, and he was not really an Atheist, except in the eyes of those who knew no god except their own tribal divinity."

Elder Joe S. Warlick, a Christian minister of Dallas, and Stanley J. Clark of Oklahoma City will debate the question of the "Divine Inspiration of the Bible" in the City Hall of Dallas at 8 o'clock Sunday night, Jan. 21. Elder Warlick will affirm that the Bible is an infallible book of superhuman origin and teaches a perfect code of morals. —Dallas (Tex.) News, Jan. 14.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The Rev. Dr. F. S. Luther, president of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., greatly shocked his audience of several hundred leading clergymen and laymen, when at a church club dinner given at Delmonico's, New York city, January 17, he declared that the church school is a failure. Dr. Luther is at the head of what has been termed the Episcopal church's "pet institution." I have been a teacher a great many years," said Dr. Luther, "and I have reached the decision that the church school is a failure. The public school is the place where the children must be educated." This statement coming from a prominent educator is highly significant. It is, however, only corroborative of a fact well-known to secular teachers all the world over. The church school has not fulfilled its promises. It aspired to unite a higher education with an ideal moral teaching; but those who have had an experience of both kinds of schools know that the idealism guaranteed by the religious institution has proved itself to be only another clerical myth. Dr. Luther testifies to this when he says that "all that the schools under control of the church organization have been able to achieve in this country is an atmosphere of religion, or a church atmosphere." This sums up perfectly the results of the church school. The main idea in such places of learning is to establish a religious atmosphere, so that whether or not the boy acquires a suitable fund of solid learning, this purpose, at least, has been accomplished, that the work has been done under the auspices of religion. The president of Trinity College can see no moral gain in the church school, for he says that "the public school teachers morals; we do not need to put a child in church to make him good." This is a true statement of the case notwithstanding the blatant utterances of those who, for the maintenance of their sectarian institutions, are forever denouncing the national school as a "godless" institution. It is agreeable to know that the position taken by THE TRUTH SEEKER through all its history, regarding public and church schools, is now receiving the approbation of both secular and religious instructors. The church school is but one form of religious cant; and if our "separated brethren" have any longer doubts upon the subject, we shall be glad to refer them to the distinguished head of the Hartford institution, who has had courage enough to tell the truth about the religious school, even at the risk of injuring his ecclesiastical reputation. A like judgment expressed by a few more men of the type of Dr. Luther, and the religious education question will settle itself permanently, beyond the hope of a joyful resurrection.

Billy Sunday has found a worthy antagonist in the Rev. Dr. J. H. McMahon, pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Roman Catholic church, New York city. After criticising the evangelist for his luxurious manner of living, the Catholic priest affirms that "some of the tragedies connected with Sunday's revivals are sad in the extreme. He calls the ministers of religion a weazened, God-forsaken, good-for-nothing 'bunch of mutts,' while the crowd roars, and then he turns his 'converts' over to this 'bunch of mutts.'" No one can fail to appreciate Father McMahon's resentment of this manifest insult "chucked" by the evangelist at the clerical profession. That profession must have sunk pretty low in recent years to brook so disgraceful a criticism, and at the same time extend its approbation and support to the very man who made it. If Sunday can say these things of the clergy and meet with little or no rebuke, the same clergy need experience no discomfort if even more incisive things are said and done, which may eventually end in wiping out this increasingly useless class from every community. The priest continues: "His converts are not sincere or lasting. An investigation of his list in Philadelphia showed that twelve thousand of the converts gave wrong addresses." It stands to reason that any conversion that is the result of emotionalism can have no lasting qualities about it. It is evidently the hope of the clergy and the churches that they may catch some additional members as the result of this fanatical campaign; and as this Lord's business is being pushed in a thoroughly human business way, there is every reason to believe that the churches will derive at least a certain additional financial support, as a result of their large money expenditure in this their most recent business adventure. As it is money that makes the mare go, so it is with churches; never mind about the quality of the souls saved; it is their money that really counts. "He does not attack the Catholics," says Dr. McMahon, "because the attack would be returned with interest." Informed as to the fate of previous evangelists who ventured to attack Roman Catholicism, Billy Sunday is too careful of his hide to walk in their steps. He is fearless in attacking Protestantism, because that form of belief is but another name for disintegration; but Catholicism stands for a certain unity and solidarity, which is not an agreeable competitor when the conflict is a question of blows. Billy is not quite a millionaire yet, and therefore wants to live a few years longer that he may be rated with the moneyed class. To persons capable of appreciating a joke, the whole affair is funny. It is an excellent illustration of the willingness of some of the people to be fooled all the time. Barnum was a true philosopher; he read his countrymen accurately.

A friend of this paper, writing from Alaska, sends us a newspaper clipping which reports a Jesuit sermon delivered at Juneau, January 9, by Father O'Reilly, from which we quote the following: "Putting aside for the time the authority of Holy Writ, we can, by the aid of the reason that is in us, see the justice of eternal punishment after death for those who depart this life with grievous sin unrepented. Sin is a withdrawal from God and revolt against right. Now, if this withdrawal and revolt should last indefinitely, say until death, what follows? Then God is obliged to punish the sinner eternally." That is a fair specimen of Roman Catholic logic. To hear such twaddle coming from the Jesuit order, supposed to represent a more or less learned type of men, is striking proof to what extent a man will forgo the wise judgment of his intellect in order to support an impossible church dogma. If a thing last indefinitely it cannot end at a particular time. If a man's revolt from God last until his death, which is a definite period of time, it cannot last indefinitely, for death is a definite event. Moreover, eternal punishment is not in accordance with human justice, for the reason that is in us has never lent itself to the approval of such an unnatural doctrine. The man who reasons after the manner of this Jesuit confuses two distinctly different conceptions, viz., time and eternity. An offense to deserve eternal punishment must be an eternal offense; in other words, an offense committed in eternity and not in time: this is what reason teaches. If time and eternity be the same, then the Jesuit is right. But to so believe is to be insane. The man has yet to be born who would honestly believe that eternal punishment is just and rightly expresses human justice and reason. For the sake of the church a man may believe that the moon is made of green cheese, but it will be a very long time before consumers will look to that planet as a source of supply. It takes a thorough-going Jesuit to talk consummate nonsense.

We find much of interest in "The Dictionary of Grammar" compiled or written by our friend James A. Hennesy of Washington, who is Francois Thane when he writes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and father of the artist Hugh Hennesy, who illustrates his articles. Hence his little work has the distinction of being the only grammar that makes its points clear by quoting from Paine, Ingersoll, Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Winwood Reade, Olive Schreiner, Omar Khayyam (Edward FitzGerald), and the like. These authors, if we except Herbert Spencer, are not grammarians, but they wrote to good effect. Spencer wrote on "The Philosophy of Style," but Spencer could err, as when he stood sponsor for the phrase "expelled the army" (omitting "from"), which is a Briticism. Paine in some instances rose above the rules. Huxley was guilty of "neither were" (using neither as plural where both antecedents were in the singular number), but generally wrote United States. Ingersoll employed an unstudied expression akin to "like I was," which is grammatically indefensible, and Winwood Reade is often deplorable from the point of view of the purist. None is quite perfect. Our author quotes William Dwight Whitney, who made language and grammar a special study, and was an authority concerning them, but has to correct him by bracketing "acquire" after the word "to" in the phrase "in order to correctness of speech." There are so many mistakes in the best of writers that many of us would read more comfortably if we cared nothing for grammar. Robert Louis Stevenson taught Fleeming Jenkin the fine points, and after that Jenkin never enjoyed reading his favorite author, Sir Walter Scott, who was fallible. The late Morgan Robertson, in an article on sea terms, wrote that in the order, "Hold your luff," luff was a participle. The proof reader queried the statement, and Robertson referred the question to us. "Luff" is a verb, like Mark Tapley, who said it was his function to "do, be or suffer," which is a correct definition of that part of speech. We could not confirm Robertson, but pass it along to Mr. Hennesy. Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls, who print this handy little Dictionary of Grammar, are grammatical sharks, and yet in one of their publications (the Literary Digest), if not in all of them, we find the profanation "women voters." (Why not ladies voters, or females voters?) Do English adjectives have the accident of number? Spencer, whom Mr. Hennesy quotes, says: "Intellectual intercourse slowly diminishes laxity of expression. By and by dictionaries give definitions. And eventually, among the most cultivated, indefiniteness is not tolerated, either in the terms used or in their grammatical combinations." But laxity quotes usage, and usage is the mob. Awkward and ungrammatical forms become entrenched, and through familiarity they, like vice, are endured and finally embraced. The "Dictionary of Grammar," a pocket-size manual, will do a great deal of good if seriously studied. It sells at 35 and 65 cents. Mr. Hennesy says it "is intended for those who need it." The reader is likely to conclude that he needs it before he has scanned a dozen of its pages.

Belief in the demonology of the Bible among a sect having followers in Texas is denoted by the report of a trial that lately took place in Houston. The Post of that city says:

"A fine of $100 and costs was assessed against Mrs. Ellen A. Newman, a leader in the Apostolic faith denomination at Brunner, who faced two judges in county court at law No. 2 Saturday on the charge of aggravated assault growing out of a beating alleged to have been administered 'to drive the evil spirit' from a 1-year-old child, taken for adoption by the woman and her husband. The fine and costs amounted to $135.45 and were paid."

The woman glibly defended her act with Bible citations and religious precedent. Her faith in scripture, while absolute, appears to have been without mixture or morality, as it turned out on cross-examination that she lives with a man as her husband who has a wife undivorced. The Apostolic faith is probably a sect of the Amish Mennonites. From what transpired at the trial of Mrs. Newman, the members would seem to believe in burning as well as beating as a means of exorcising evil spirits. Biblical justification is at Proverbs xxii, 15: "Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child, but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him." Millions of children have suffered corporeal punishment on the strength of texts found in the scriptures. As a sequel of the trial of Mrs. Newman, her husband, the Rev. W. O. Newman, has been arraigned on a charge of bigamy.

Recently when a Californian clergyman was on trial for debauching a young girl of his congregation, the mother of the girl appeared as a witness for the defense and threw the blame on her daughter instead of the man of God who had led her astray. Another case where the naturally unexpected took place is reported from Chicago. The Tribune of that city (Jan. 12) says: "The mother of a murdered girl sought leniency for her daughter's slayer in Judge Barret's court yesterday." A man named John Pettit had married the daughter, and then killed her, mutilating the body. The murderer explained that he regarded his bride as an angel before he married her, and that he killed her because he wanted her to remain an angel. With him, he said, "it was a matter of religious belief." There are inspired precedents for such a course. Jephthah slew his daughter as a matter of religious belief, and Abraham was ready to do the same by his son. There have been as many killings prompted by religion as by any other motive, probably more. Mothers have slain their own children under such influences oftener than they have shown themselves reconciled to offenses committed against them by others.

One of our New York reviews that is managing a fund for the relief of Belgian children heads its appeal for contributions with the words: "In the name of God the Father." If we were engaged in propagating a religion that teaches the existence of a "God the father" who takes a particular interest in the welfare of his children, we should not think it promotive of that belief to mention the said father conspicuously in these times when, according to the appeal of this review, a million of such children are undergoing slow starvation without that father's notice. We should not mention his name. We should can it for the nonce, and base our appeal rather on that simple humanity which furnishes all the aid, while God gets the credit and the praise. Said Festus to Paul: "Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? unto Cæsar shalt thou go?" Suppose humanity should answer the call for help for the starving "in the name of God": "Hast thou appealed to God? unto God shalt thou go." Would the children get anything?

The federated Hebrew Congregations of America, in convention at Baltimore, received a report from the National Jewish Advisory Board condemning the reading of the Bible, now prevalent in public schools, as "an infringement upon the rights of every citizen," insofar as it compels Jewish taxpayers to send their children to schools where a religious interpretation is put upon the Bible; and the approval of the convention was asked of the survey which places on the "honor roll of American cities" the names of 19 cities "which have excelled in the civic virtue of having no objectionable literature in their public schools and no sectarian songs in their school assemblies." Between the Jews and the Catholics the Protestants are likely to lose the hold they now have on the public schools through the use of the Bible either as a text-book or a book of religious worship. If they were wise they would direct their efforts in time to the secularizing of public instruction; for the Jews, as shown by their demand for more army chaplains, are not committed to separation of church and state, and no more than Catholics would they scruple to teach their own religion in the schools if the way were clear to introduce it.

Theology dies hard; but, periodically robbed of some of its authority, it then readjusts itself to the changed limitations with renewed vitality. The greatest advances in modern times in theological speculation and biblical criticism are due to theology's being shorn of its assumed dominion over morality. A greater social gain, however, is the emancipation of ethics. The harmony of ethical systems is incomplete, but the service of ethics is vastly enriched by the substitution of social utility for theological sanction. A new social dynamic is found in the conception that man's chief activities are to be devoted to the improvement of this world rather than the preparation for another. A corollary that ought to be satisfactory even to the theologian is that life in any world is determined only by service in this. Thus far is non-theological ethics triumphant over historic theologies.

Miss Kathleen Burke, who has written a book on what she saw as an army nurse in France, tells of a Mohammedan surgeon, educated in England, who shrived a dying Catholic French soldier, and of a Jewish rabbi who was shot at the battle of Aisne while holding a crucifix to the lips of another. On this the Chicago Evening Post remarks that "religion on the battle-field seems a bigger thing than it often appears to be a home." It is notable that in each of the instances quoted the "bigness" was displayed by men who, according to the creed of the soldiers to whom they administered the last rites, will be everlastingly excluded from the Catholic heaven. There was hardly more "religion" in the actions of the Mohammedan and the Jew than in that of presenting to the dying man a cup of water. They were prompted by humanity, not by theology.

Fifty thousand dollars fell into the hat when the Bostonians were held up for a free-will offering by the evangelist. Criticism is directed at the Rev. W. A. Sunday, the evangelist aforesaid, who is accused of evangelizing for the money there is in it. This will not dissuade him from taking all he can get, as he has shown himself impervious to criticism on any of his methods, or his errors either of statement or of style. We might as successfully appeal to the Hungry Joes, the confidence men who work the public on the theory that a sucker is born every minute. The way to abolish the evangelistic sharpers is to inform the public that the religion which they preach is not true. The Sundays will not get rich making dupes and lunatics when the people become Freethinkers.

Victor Yarros, in Reedy's Mirror of January 5, has a two-column article which reports from a London paper the "confessions and recantations of eminent men and women" under the head of "My Changed Opinions." Bernard Shaw is the only one who declares his opinions unchanged. Of course, the human mind often exemplifies contradiction. Sir Robert Pierce has come to believe in the beneficent effects of war, and Mr. Yarros suggests that it should be continued for two or three years more for the sake of its "beneficent effects." Two former free traders cannot now contemplate the reestablishment of trade relations with Germany "without disgust and indignation." Two professional authors state that "war has removed the fear of death." Rebecca West says: "War has confirmed me in Socialism." The conclusion of the whole matter, according to Mr. Yarros, is that the thoughtful did not need the terrible object lesson, and the shallow have apparently derived no intellectual or moral benefit from it.—Unity.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM FAVORED.

From Capt. E. H. Allison. So. Dakota. To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Mitakola (that's Sioux for "my own friend"), I noted what you said in the "Letterbox." I think I told you in the last letter that I had commanded a company of scouts at Fort Yates, Dak. Ter., from 1875 until 1880. Later I was chief of scouts for the department and on several occasions had command of troops in field service as well as scouts. Thus it came about that on the river in Montana I am Colonel Allison, while on the lower river country I am reduced to the rank of Captain. However, Congress has granted me a very liberal pension for my services, which is worth more to me than all the titles in the world.

That I am an Atheist goes without saying. Therefore I have only myself to depend on. Long years ago I voluntarily relinquished all right and title, which I inherited in my youth, to the protecting arms of Jesus, and while I have to hoe my own row, I don't have to pay out money for pew rent and a preacher's salary.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is all right, always has been all right, is growing better year by year. I would suggest, however, that more space be given to Bible criticism. Take, for instance, the opening chapters of the book of Job. The sixth verse of the first chapter reads: "Now there was a day when the sons of God"—what! sons of God? thought he had one only begotten son—"came to present themselves before the Lord; and Satan came also among them." How did it happen that Satan was also among them? Had he not been cast out of heaven and the pearly gates closed against him? But here we find him gallivanting around with the sons of God and with them making a social call at the court of the high and mighty ruler of the universe. Of course he couldn't hide from the all-seeing eye. God spotted him and spake unto him, saying: "Where (in hell) did you come from?" And Satan answered him, saying, "I've been takin' a look at that footstool of yours; some folks call it the earth." And the Lord said unto Satan, "Did you notice that man Job of mine? He's a crackerjack, squarest one I ever made. He's dead afraid of me and always stands by me." Then Satan answered the Lord and said, "Why (the hell) shouldn't he? You've given him every damn thing he wants. But I'll tell you what kind of a man he is. Just touch him for his wealth and he'll cuss you to your face." And God fell to the devil's scheme. He gave everything that Job possessed into Satan's hand. This involved the destruction of immense property and the loss of hundreds of human lives. Then away went Satan back to earth, where he cleaned up poor old Job, leaving him as poor as his proverbial turkey.

The second chapter begins, "Again, there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord and Satan came also among them to present himself before the Lord." So it appears to have been a regular and proper thing for Satan to make social calls at the court of high heaven, and to associate familiarly with the sons of God. On this occasion God fell still further to the wiles of Satan, though he accused Satan of having "moved" him to afflict his servant Job. What! Almighty God under the influence of Satan? Sure thing. Doesn't he say so himself? "Although thou movedst me against him to destroy him without cause." Oh, rats. And men call that kind of tommyrot "divine inspiration."

MR. ATKINSON APPRECIATED.

From W. H. Mason, Colorado.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 6, 1917, containing the splendid article by Sam Atkinson on "Freedom of the Movies," ought to be sent to every movie exhibitor and film producer in America. It should also be reprinted in every film and picture publication in the country.

I was present at the lecture and discussion by Dr. Atkinson and his reply to the ministers and social workers after the purview of "Protect Your Daughters" at the Paris theatre, in Denver, Colorado. The logic of Sam Atkinson could not be touched by the ministers and social workers; the doctor's lectures before the pictures held his audiences with silent respect and thanks by their hearty applause by his telling remarks on our social and immoral society. The people sat up, and did take notice of every word spoken. Dr. Sam Atkinson is doing a work for the moral uplift that the church cannot do. When we consider the censorship of the press, picture and freedom of expression, we must look out what is before us in America, or we will be like unto the people in England fifty or sixty years ago, when the church warden could under the law take you by force to the church of England. This attempt I saw tried on my father one Sunday morning as we were walking over the fields. These church beetles failed, gowns ripped in ribbons, and the blood of English sons of the church was feeding the daisies. No arrest was made; father did the arresting. Every Freethinker has a duty to perform not only by word of mouth, but by helping with money to sustain the worthy lecturers who are fighting your and my battle for freedom of speech.

A lecture fund should be founded to help the lecturers who are devoting their time and talents to the cause of Free-thought. Wake up! The watchman is on the walls of liberty watching the clergy in their attempt to suppress everything that does not bring grist to their mill, for religion is purely a business proposition with them. Keep your able lecturers in the field and establish a college wherein young men can be trained for the work. It can be done if the liberals will do their duty.

THE BLASPHEMY CASE.

From J. A. Bernard, Colorado.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I consider myself fortunate to be able to take advantage of the opportunity to assist in helping to defray some of the expenses connected with the publication of the book on the Blasphemy Trial. You state it will be on deposit in public libraries; I hope and trust it will, as it should prove very instructive, interesting, and an eye-opener to many, and show to what degree some narrow-minded peddlers of myths and superstitions will stoop even in this day to keep, or try to keep, alive preconceived notions born of fear and ignorance ages and ages ago.

These old Puritan laws (holdovers from the days of slavery, witchcraft, etc.) must be exposed, ridiculed, condemned, and wiped out forever from those of our states which are unfortunate enough to carry these relics of the dark ages in their constitutions. Your idea of putting this book where it will be accessible to the public is a good one and should produce good results. I hope Freethinkers and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will respond freely and in good numbers in assisting in this grand cause, and Mr. Schroeder is certainly entitled to the support of every liberal-minded citizen in this work for the repeal of these blasphemy statutes.

LIFE HERE AND HEREAFTER.

From William Hinchcliffe, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It is a pleasure to me to relate in my old age, the happiness I have received from your school of thought. I often look back and view the two-thirds of my life that has been spent, when practically I knew nothing but what had been taught to me in the church and Sunday school. It seems only like yesterday, when in childhood days we sang with merry voices that, which used to inspire us so much: "I want to be an angel, and with the angels stand, a crown upon my forehead and a harp within my hand."

And even to-day I can hear the voice of my old grandmother singing with all sincerity what she called that grand old hymn:

"Oh! heaven, sweet heaven of rest! how I long to be there and thy glories to share, and to lean on Jesus' breast."

It almost seems a shame to be denied the consolation I received in my early days, which gave me cheer and comfort in that so-called grand old hymn: "Happy day, oh happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away, he taught me how to watch and pray, and live rejoicing every day, happy day, oh happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away."

In my declining years the happy day is that reason has washed some of my ignorance and delusions away.

It only takes a little reason to make the assertion that ignorance and the Bible know not the meaning of "democracy," but to obey our masters and everything contained in that book with the stamp of holiness upon it. Under the influence of an authority which it is "impious to question," Christianity has wrecked the minds of its believers. They have become contented, and neglected this world for another. What greater work can the Freethinker do than to educate his fellowman out of this delusion, which is the cause of most of the hatred and strife there is in the world to-day. To me heaven is like the principle of force and matter. "No force no matter"; no heaven, no Christianity.

Even if there were a heaven at one time, it by no means follows that it still exists. Some roving comet may have swept it into "chaos" with a swirl of its flowing tail. "In fact, the silence and apathy of the once active sphere is somewhat suggestive of its possible demolition." If the universal change we see in all nature is not a fake, the eternal heavenly home with the Christian's heavenly father sitting on the throne surrounded by all the saints and angels, and the dear ones that are supposed to have gone there in the past, will have to find another abode when nature calls that chemical habitation into her laboratory to mold them over again. What a blessed assurance it is to know that nothing remains in an "eternal state"; not even the stars above.

The teachings of Christianity have seemed to be taken as adding plausibility to faith in future emigration to a place that would allow continued existence. But why should we assume to thus find evidence of a plan affecting our future, when we have found none affecting our past? It seems plain to me that every atom of physical structure that the world has ever known, was contained in that "fiery ball" hurled from the sun, and is present to-day, some in solid, and some in liquid or gaseous forms. Some of these atoms go to form new bodies, animal as well as human; many enter into plant life and others are buried in the dust and dirt of ages.

It seems plain to me that all animated life, man included, is much like the sausage machine. We keep grinding over and over again these atoms that are immortal, that must have been in some of the heroes or the great monsters of the past ages.

No one has ever discovered any possible substance of mind possessing such properties as would enable it to leave this planet. On the contrary, life developed here and its elements would naturally remain where they originated. Those who imagine that there never was life until a god created it suddenly on this planet, are in the midst of a great delusion. Reason makes the assertion that life must have existed for ever and ever on other planets.

The Christians talk about the inspiration from a god. It is nothing in comparison with the scientific fact, which Tyndall proclaims: "Behold the earth," he says, "its glorious course to run, a fiery ball hurled from the sun." What a blessed assurance it is to know that the pen and ink I am writing with were contained in that fiery ball. And the entire evolutionary process that it has passed through is only like the ticking of a watch with the eternal scheme that has been in force on other planets.

What a consolation it is to know that we are a scientific combination of chemical elements whose active changes manifest themselves in physical force and mental activities. Reason tells us that if the vital energy of the chemicals lessens, the other activities lessen in proportion, and the logical conclusion is that they also cease entirely when the fire goes out, or these chemical elements are let loose, or disentangled. What assurance have we that they will ever be organized again to meet as we are known in the Christian heaven that John the Divine tells us about in Revelation, Chap. iv.

"And out of the throne proceeded lightnings, and thunderings, and voices. And there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven spirits of God. And before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto crystal. And in the midst of the throne and round about the throne, were four beasts full of eyes before and behind. And the four beasts had each of them six wings about them; and they were full of eyes within; and they rest not day and night, saying, holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. And when those beasts give glory, and honor, and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever, the four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created."

I feel much like old John Peck. I would rather take a sea biscuit and go below, than mingle with that kind of society in St. John's eternal heavenly home.

SEEKING THE PRIMAL RELIGION. From H. V. Honn, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In his contention that our Christian friend Jesus and his fifteen crucified prototypes are merely the sun-god, recast, your contributor, Richard Ellsworth, has set his feet upon incontestable ground. But it is well never to lose sight of the fact that the solar cult is readaptation, and not primal. The final origin of religion is physiological, i. e., phallic. As man's knowledge of physiology grew, his pudency grew with it, and the outward forms of religion changed in kind. Religion has grown heartily ashamed of her origins, and much of the sun-god ritual is euphemism to begot a "spiritual perception" grown nasty-nice. There are many thought-crystals in the world's oldest scriptures which go far to prove that men lived on this planet, postulated their god(dess)s, and died, before mortal eye beheld the sun. Proof of this startling statement must yield here to lack of space, but for a very plain and simple scientific proof the reader is referred to Vail's "Annular World" ("The Annular World Theory," by Isaac Newton Vail, Pasadena, Cal.).

Again, the common birth of the world's saviors in a cave has nothing to do with lowly origins, but is likewise a physiological phenomenon. The prototype of all is "She-who-came-from-herself" and her son, virgin-born because no consort had yet been evolved. This is the cultus of the yoni, which obtained before the fatherhood-of-god had been established. However overlaid with gods, trinity and what-not, the virgin-mother belongs to the yoni-cultus, and it is significant that, in spite of the establishment of the god-the-father cult in Judaism, the Virgin Mary was "overshadowed," not by god-the-father but by the Holy Ghost. Now "ghost" is breath, and life, born of water-and-breath, is the "two truths," the sine qua non of the yoni cult. This is primal, so stubbornly do the ancient concepts persist.

Not only does the yoni furnish the name for the cave, but also for house and home. In Hebrew, beth is at once yoni and house, just as English hame, i. e., home, is the same. Therefore, beth-el is not only god-house, but god-yoni as well since the yoni was at once the first, house, home and god. The types are forever bound up with the names, and speech is impossible without renaming the types.

SPRADING HAS A BIRTHDAY. From C. Severance, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Birthdays are mile-stones on the journey of life that persist in coming once a year, and no way has yet been discovered to stop or defer their arrival; so the proper thing is to receive them graciously, and if convenient, with suitable demonstrations which custom has long insured to them.

A birthday party with the usual banquet, that has such strong attractions for our "carnal appetites"—these words are borrowed from our religious friends—was a prominent feature of Charles T. Sprading's birthday that came and was duly celebrated by himself and wife and a goodly number of friends in the Liberal Club, on Monday evening, Jan. 8. Mr. Sprading not being of that sex that is timid about revealing the number of its years "in the earth form," it will occasion no shock to him, or be a violation of confidence, to state that he went past the 47th mile-stone that day; and if good wishes for his future, and the many birthdays to come that were desired for him are realized, it will be a long time before he will have his last one.

Mrs. Sprading made her table so attractive with her abilities as a culinary artist, that I am forced to make this confession, which applies to all present with equal force; that more good things were consumed than were really needed to meet the demands of the body. But who is able at all times to resist the power of temptation, before which good old Adam once fell, in the apple season, to our lasting sorrow?

What a stimulant to sociability is found in the pleasures of the table, and how nimble are the movements of the tongue after a good repast. Hours come and go with surprising rapidity; and with good canned music furnished by a New York man by the name of Edison, they flew by that evening with speed hardly excelled by Captain Stormfield on his journey to his heavenly home. We met for pleasure and we surely had it; and memory added to her storehouse of recorded events one more that will be long treasured as we move on to the end of the journey with only one terminus. So "while we live let us live," to put into English the old Roman idea of life; and many may be the years that Sprading has before him, to continue his public work as a successful foe of Christian superstition and all forms of mental tyranny.

THE PATHFINDER AND LINCOLN'S RELIGION.

From D. I. McCabe, Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I have been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER only about nine months, but a Freethinker for a longer period, although reared a believer in the Bible and the Christian religion.

I take several papers, but there is none that I enjoy reading so well as THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wish all publications were as fair and gave as accurate information as does THE TRUTH SEEKER. If they would, how much better this world would be to live in! And that reminds me of a publication printed at Washington, D. C., that is called The Pathfinder, and which has a large circulation among the teachers of this country, and boasts of giving accurate information on all subjects treated in its columns. In its department called "The Question Box," a few weeks ago a reader of that paper asked for the religious faiths of our Presidents and about Abraham Lincoln's religious beliefs in particular, and the answer was that Lincoln was a Presbyterian, and gave some church connection for each of the other Presidents (naming the church each was supposed to have belonged to) with one exception, Jefferson, who they admitted was a liberal.

Upon reading their answer I immediately wrote them a short letter and asked them for their authority concerning Lincoln's religious faith as they gave it, but up to date I have received no communication from them nor have they made any attempt to answer my question through the columns of The Pathfinder, which leads me to believe that they are not sure that they have found the "path" yet. Anyway, I refuse to accept them as a guide until I have more accurate information as to their reliability as a guide. I think it is too bad that a paper with such a name should be so unfortunate as to lose its way like that, and especially when they cause so many others to get lost, too, who are following them, and who actually think they are on their way to the "path" or have already found it.

Will not THE TRUTH SEEKER and its readers turn on the light of truth and help the Pathfinder to find the trail?

I hope that the truth will finally prevail, and I feel certain that it some time will.

A RATIONALIST CIRCULAR.

From E. Marshall, Michigan.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As one means of securing fuller support of our movement, we have just circulated the following appeal to the known friends here in Detroit. As THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches many unknown to us, the insertion of this letter would undoubtedly further the prospects of our own individual Association; and as the argument used is applicable to all Freethought Societies, it may also react to the advantage of others besides those for whom it was primarily designed:

"The object of our movement may be defined, broadly, as the propagation of Rationalist thought, and the organizing of its supporters.

"The significance of organization lies in the fact that the forces of superstition and stagnation are most persistent in this direction; and, owing to their organization, obtain privileges and power altogether beyond their numerical deserts. (To-day, it is largely a question, with them, of recruiting; to-morrow, it may be conscription.)

"Detroit Freethinkers may be numbered by the thousands, but they have no particular influence in civic affairs owing to their lack of cohesion.

"A feverish interest in our movement is manifested at the time of transition from superstition to reason, but when the transfer is completed, the great majority cease to take active interest in the movement which has liberated them; presumably because of the realization of the utter absurdity of orthodoxy.

"Because of the scope of our present freedom, the danger of reversion to the days of oppression, and of suppression, is lightly regarded. But, if we are not more demonstrative in our attitude, a return to the days of mental slavery will surely ensue.

"We love, honor, and revere the memories of our emancipators—they were men of large vision and sacrificed themselves for the benefit to accrue to their descendants—that is, you and me.

"What are we doing for our successors?

"By selfish revelry in the luxurious ease of conscience, our children and grandchildren may have occasion to condemn our memories in the sacrifices they may have to make to regain that which we have dissipated. Is this manly and rational?

"It is our duty to belong to the organization; to support it by the payment of the annual dues; to make as regular attendance as possible; and aid its propaganda to the extent of opportunity and ability.

"Your attendance would result in better organization quarters, better lecturers, and more fruitful and tangible results. Other organizations command a weekly attendance of 1,500, and the services of a lecturer of pronounced ability. This involves income and audience. We are unable to do likewise because so few are willing to make the small sacrifice of weekly attendance while we are in the formative stage and struggling for recognition. Many of those to whom this appeal is directed would attend, for the intellectual treat afforded, were a powerful speaker available. Please ask yourselves just how much pure selfishness would be involved by such conduct.

"The situation to-day is that it is difficult to secure dependable help for even our present modest requirements. We are encouraged by the numerous and enlarging attendance—we are humiliated by a sense of shame arising from the apparent indifference of (some of) our member or those who should be members.

"Such as are not content to receive all and give nothing in return, will contrive to give two hours of their time once a week (Sunday, 2.30-4.30, Gerow's Hall, 55 Grand River ave., W.)."

REPLY TO A CRITIC.

From Libby Culbertson Macdonald, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Do not sit up nights trembling for my fate when Mary Monico proceeds to castigate me, for I intend to sleep soundly as usual. No matter what Mary says, she shall have the argument all to herself, and the last word, for I shall not reply. I have no talent or inclination and less time for debate with anyone, and she will get no fight out of me. My case is just like that of the young school boy. The teacher asked him:

"What is the shape of the earth?"

Boy: "The earth is round."

Teacher, brusquely: "How do you know the earth is round?"

Boy: "Oh, well! It's square then. I don't want to get into any argument about it."

Mary Monico is clever, she has sense, and knows how to interpret, how "to read between the lines," in the phrase you object to. Being a woman she will instinctively understand my meaning when I wrote, "One never loses by putting a woman to the fore in anything or anywhere." That is a truth that the whole world is beginning to find out. Being a man, however, you are nothing if not literal, and labeled diagrams must be made for you before you can comprehend.

Now, Johnson, will you be good? I'm doing the best I can, and what better can you do anyway?

I am feeling quite chesty, believe me, when I consider that the next Congress will have the first, genuine, dyed-in-the-wool maiden speech ever heard on the floor of that august body.

A PROGRESSIVE BAPTIST PREACHER.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am that same Baptist preacher who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, and who ordered a few books some time ago.

And I assure you that I enjoy my reading. I am a Freethinker, and will not let anything hold me down on such personal rights. But in my work, as I have to deal with others who have the same rights, I have to grant them what I take. And I am finding that the only way to get them to go my way is to go slowly and lead them—give them something better—and I have that, I believe.

I do believe in a religion of reason; I do not care whether it is called religion, or reason, or life, or society, or what. What it is, is what I want. And I can see that my people are getting broader. But if I were to call my belief Atheism, Infidelity, Agnosticism, etc., I would preach no more. It is going to take time to bring us out of the superstition of religion. I believe my way is the best in the long run.

My reading may turn me from my present views and methods, but if it should I believe that I will not be able to do as much to bring them to an age of reason as I am. I want that book of "Bible Myths," but I am not able to get it now.

You may withhold by name for the sake of my work. I believe I am right.

"Dost thou love life? Then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of."—Benjamin Franklin.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

If Trees Could Talk.

If trees could talk, the tales they'd tell
Would surely be worth listening to.
The trees that form the shady dell,
Where lovers their fond vows renew;
The trees that guard the home, the street
Where children play and elders rest;
What varied tales would they repeat
Of hopes deferred or hearts oppressed
Of happy lives divinely blest.

If trees could talk, how oft we'd hear
Of gross mistreatment, lack of care,
Borne patiently for many a year,
While thoughtless mortals unaware
Of how trees suffer, why they fail,
Put forth no effort to repel
The foes that constantly assail,
Sad tales like this we know full well,
A myriad suffering trees would tell.

If trees could talk, methinks their words
Would sound a protest loud and stern
For loss of their good friends, the birds,
And make a plea for their return.
Trees need the birds and so do we.
In the incessant fight to stay
The foes that so persistently
On flowers, and fruit and foliage prey,
Our allies, vigilant, are they.

Trees cannot talk, and yet, to him
Who truly loves, these friends of man,
Their every leaf and flower and limb
Is vocal. Since the world began
The trees have been our steadfast friends,
And our well being constantly
Upon their life and growth depends.
How faithful then our care should be,
How fondly should we love the tree.

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Volney, February 3, 1757—April 25, 1820.

Constantin Francois Chasseboeuf, known as the Count de Volney, the French savant or man of exceptional learning, philosophical writer and politician, was born in Craon, France, February 3, 1757. He studied medicine and devoted much attention to Eastern languages. Having spent much time in Egypt, he wrote, in 1787, his first book, "Voyage to Egypt and Syria." He espoused the cause of the French Revolution, and in 1789 was elected to the States-General. In 1791 he wrote his most famous work, "Les Ruines, ou Meditations sur les Revolutions des Empires," commonly known as "Volney's Ruins." From the time of its publication until now, this has been a standard Free-thought work, almost as much so as the "Age of Reason." From 1795 until 1808 he traveled in the United States, and in 1803 published a work on the climate of America. Upon his arrival in Philadelphia he sought President Washington to obtain from him a letter of introduction to the American people. Washington did not want to become responsible for his ideas, though his own were the same, so he merely wrote: "C. Volney needs no introduction from G. Washington." This was sufficient for his purposes and proves how politic the "Father of his Country" was. Volney, like other great Freethinkers, had to labor under many false charges. While in France, in 1793, he wrote a book which caused him to be accused of royalist leanings, and, like Paine, he was brought beneath the shadow of the guillotine. He was saved by the downfall of Robespierre. While in the United States he was charged with being a French spy intriguing for the reoccupation of Louisiana by France. This was a most absurd charge, as France did not want the territory back, while England was the country scheming to obtain it.

He was made a Senator, and Academician in 1799, a Count by Napoleon in 1808, and Commander of the Legion of Honor by Louis XVIII. in 1814. In the latter year he published in three volumes his "New Researches into Ancient History." He died in Paris, April 25, 1820.

Volney was a scholar, an original thinker and a man of very unusual knowledge. Much has been written about him in the French language, but unfortunately none of it has been translated and is therefore inaccessible to English readers.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:
Jan. 29. Thomas Paine born, 1737. Paine Hall dedicated, 1875. Swedenborg born, 1688.

Feb. 2. Ledru-Rollin, French advocate of liberty, born, 1807. Wm. Phipps, opponent of punishment for alleged witchcraft in Boston in 1692, born, 1651. Wendell Phillips died, 1884.
Feb. 3. Horace Greeley born, 1811.
Feb. 4. Southern Confederacy formed, 1851.

College Education—Pro and Con.

Men who have succeeded in life with a common school education do not place the highest value on a course in college. It is said that Thomas A. Edison, the renowned inventor, favors only such colleges as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he sent his own son.

Again, for ten years or more Charles M. Schwab, the steel magnate, has been quoted as opposed to college education, viewing it as a hindrance to success in business. He denies that he ever took such an attitude. In talking to a group of East Side boys in New York city he told them that they stood as good a chance of success as any boys in the world, if they kept to their course and a better chance than many college boys. Here are the words he used concerning college boys which have been so often misquoted: "The higher education for which these boys were giving up three or four of their best years holds no advantage of itself in the coming business battle. It will be valueless industrially unless it is accompanied by a capacity for plain, hard work, for concentration, for clear thinking. These qualities are not learned in text-books."

He never meant to say that a college education is worthless. He declares (in the American Magazine) that he is not and never has been against such education. He says:

"What ever may have been true in the past, there is no doubt that to-day industrial conditions favor the college man. Old crudities are disappearing; science is dethroning chance. Business is conducted on so vast a scale that the broadening effects of higher education, gained through proper application, write a large figure.

"But the college man who thinks that his greater learning gives him the privilege of working less hard than the man without such an education is going to wake up in disaster. I regret that some college men enter industry with an inflated notion of their own value. They want to capitalize at once their education, and the time they spent getting it. . . . Neither knowledge of the classics nor mathematical proficiency can be converted overnight into a marketable commodity. "Higher education has its chance later, when the college boy has mastered all the minor details of the business. Then, if he went to college with serious purpose, and studied hard and systematically, he has the advantage of a thoroughly trained mind to tackle larger problems, a mind which should be broader and more flexible because of its greater powers of imagination and logical reasoning."

In other words, Mr. Schwab believes that in business life the benefits of a college education are deferred benefits. They manifest themselves not at first but a few years after graduation. We think, says Current Opinion, that most college men will agree with Mr. Schwab in this as well as in the following views:

"Most college men are free from false pride. But occasionally employers come in contact with one who has it, and judge all college men by him. In business we buy by sample, and sometimes the wrong sort of sample from an institution of higher learning makes an employer feel as Robert Hall felt when he wrote of Kippis that 'He might be a very clever man by nature, for aught I know, but he laid so many books on top of his head that his brains could not move.'

"While I have no sympathy with this occasional prejudice against college men, yet I have found frequently that the very fact of having been denied a higher education works in favor of the common-school boy. He has to labor after hours for his education, nights and holidays he has hammered at the forge of ambition. Success is built on such habits. College men are likely to think their evenings are meant for music, society, the theatre, rather than for study that will add to their business knowledge."

Enforced Reformed Spelling.

That it is not absolutely necessary to have a full supply of every letter in the alphabet in order to print a readable article is proven by the following editorial (with F's and K's missing) reproduced by the Watchman-Examiner:

"We begin the publication of the Rocay Mountain Cyclone with some phew diphthiculties in the way. The type phounders phrom whom we bought our outphit phor this printing ophphice phailed to supply us with any ephs or cays, and it will be phour or phive weex bephore we can get any. It is no joque to us—it's a serious aphphair."

The Ten Commandments Set to Music.

A Highlander who prided himself on being able to play any tune on the pipes, says the Youth's Companion, perched himself on the side of one of his native hills one Sunday morning and commenced blowing for all he was worth.

Presently the minister came along and, going up to MacDougall with the intention of severely reprimanding him, asked in a very harsh voice, "MacDougall, do you know the Ten Commandments?"

MacDougall scratched his chin for a moment, and then, in an equally harsh voice, said:

"D'ye think you've beat me? Just wistle the first three or four bars, and I'll hae a try at it."

Those Fighting Neutrals.

Lem Cotton, sole proprietor of a white-washing emporium in a Southern town, relates the San Francisco Argonaut, shone in the noonday sun as though he had given his skin a coat of stove polish. As he toiled away at the task of lighting up the judge's stable, the judge himself came along. "How do, cunnel, how do?" said Lem. "How 'at wah goin' to-day?" "Nothing new to-day," replied his honor. "Which side you-all on, cunnel?" asked the white-washer. The judge, scenting the opportunity for some amusement, answered: "Have you ever heard of the great neutral people, Lem? Well, I'm neutral." Lem never batted an eye as he answered: "'Es, 'em neutrals great fightahs. Ah hope 'ey win."

What Shakespeare Did.

William Dean Howells is credited by London Titbits with telling this Shakespeare story:

"In Stratford," he says, "during one of the Shakespeare jubilees, an American tourist approached an aged villager in a smock, and said:

"Who is this chap Shakespeare, anyway?"

"He was a writer, sir."

"Oh, but there are lots of writers. Why do you make such an infernal fuss over this one? Wherever I turn I see Shakespeare hotels, Shakespeare cakes, Shakespeare chocolates, Shakespeare shoes. What the deuce did he write—magazine stories, attacks on the Government, shady novels?"

"No, sir; oh, no, sir," said the aged villager. 'I understand he writ for the Bible, sir.'"

Harmony and Hominy.

In a Southern mission Sunday school, where the little darkies were allowed to choose their own hymns, the favorite hymn, we read in Musical America, had a chorus ending with the lines:

"And we'll all swell the harmony
In Heaven, our home."

They sang it so often and with so much gusto that the teacher's interest was aroused and she decided to listen instead of helping them. Then she understood their partiality—with rapt faces they were voicing their belief:

"And we'll all smell the hominy
In Heaven, our home."

Being "Good."

Mary Pickford, the "movie" actress, says:

"It is easy for a pretty girl to be good if she is rich, but a pretty girl who is poor has a lot of temptations. The pretty girl who is poor is a little bit in the position of the boy in the grocery shop.

"A grocer leaned over the counter and yelled at a boy who stood close to an apple barrel:

"Are you tryin' to steal them apples, boy?"

"No—no, sir," the boy faltered. 'I'm tryin' not to!'"

No Time for a Loaf.

Some time ago, when a local corps was reviewed by Sir Ian Hamilton, one officer was mounted on a horse that had previously distinguished itself in a bakery business. Somebody recognized the horse, and shouted, "Baker!" The horse promptly stopped dead, and nothing could urge it on.

The situation was getting painful when the officer was struck with a brilliant idea, and remarked, "Not to-day, thank you." The procession then moved on.—Weekly Telegraph.

True Vigilance.

In a place in New Jersey a town building caught fire, and the extinguishers failed to do their work. A few days later at the town meeting some citizens tried to learn the reason. After they had freely discussed the subject, one of them said, "Mr. Chairman, I make a motion that the fire-extinguishers be examined ten days before every fire."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The Pig and the Pug.

Said the pig to the pug, "You are proud, And you're not very clever or big." Said the pug to the pig, "You are right, But I'm glad that I'm not a pig." "Will you tell me the difference, I pray?" Said the pig with the bel-li-ge-rent cry; And the pug lost his grammer, And he hastened to stammer—

"There's a difference between U and I." —Charles Irwin Junkin.

J. B. GALBRAITH, Texas.—Your report on the efficiency of Mr. Clark in his debate with Elder Warlick is good news. A subscriber in West Virginia is inquiring for a Freethought debater to meet a local Infidel-smasher. Perhaps Stanley Clark is the man he wants.

C. W. C., New York.—The word "hum-dinger" used in our letter to you has no definition and no equivalent. The dictionaries omit it because no lexicographer has the flow of language to tell what it means. Professor Bacon of Yale intimates that your observations on his late discourse in Philadelphia were misdirected, since they do not apply to what he said.

G. G. O., Chicago.—Your statement of the case is excellent—that "truth is the most perfect knowledge attainable concerning any given question," and that we desire it, having "confidence that such knowledge may be dependent upon for the highest ends of life." We applaud that sentiment, and we hold that the same service is done to truth when an old error is exposed as when new knowledge is acquired. Truth is not the middle name of this paper, but the first.

L. R., Pittsburgh, Pa.—In the Fra for January the editor, Felix Shay, writes to John S. Sumner, secretary of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, to inquire why he does not suppress the Bible on account of its violation of the law forbidding the circulation of obscene literature; and he cites Gen. xvi, 2-4, as an example of the kind of inspired narrative that would not be allowed in contemporaneous fiction. This may answer, in part, your question as to where the raw stuff in the Bible is to be found.

A. JOHNSON, Washington.—Should your senator, Mr. Poindexter, succeed in figuring out what ulterior interests are involved in the proposed changes in postal rates, which aim to limit the circulation of weekly and monthly publications, scientific, agricultural, mechanical and religious, by a prohibitory increase in charges for carrying them, we hope he will make the discovery public. The changes are not in the interest of the people nor the publishers, but seem to be part of a movement to restrict a free press and foster sectionalism.

T. M. GILMORE, Louisville, Ky.—We are so used to the assumption of unconstitutional powers by Congress that we do not get excited over the bill censoring the advertising columns of newspapers. Free-thinkers have been sounding the alarm for forty years, but never got any response from the publicans who are now desperately opposing the measures that propose to close the mails to newspapers containing beer and whisky advertising. Had the principle been denied when the Comstock law was proposed, the consequences of subsequent legislation of a similar nature would have been avoided. We have always questioned the right of Congress to concern itself with the moral character of anything deposited in the mails.

MY JOURNEY INTO SPIRITUALISM—AND OUT.

By W. F. Jamieson, Pentwater, Mich.
XII.

DO SPIRITS REALLY COMMUNICATE WITH THE INHABITANTS OF EARTH?

In volume I of "My Journey," not yet published, I furnish a detailed account of my experiences with mediums, and now, after those years of personal investigation, I give the explanations of the very best authors in Spiritualism, and I think by their own words it is clear that there is no such thing as the communication of spirits with mortals. Reason, logic, fact are all against Spiritualism.

Mr. Charles Dawbarn, a Spiritualist writer of great repute, of whom the Chicago paper, The Progressive Thinker, said: "The brilliant California author, psychometrist and speaker" "analyzes," and that his thoughts are "worthy of the attention of Spiritualists everywhere." That is a hearty indorsement; and, yet, how he can remain a Spiritualist, after presenting the views he does, is a puzzle. He makes a mystery out of the great natural law of "vibration." As Ervin A. Rice of Chicago, in his book, "Why Are We Here?" says: "Science informs us that all matter is in constant motion. The atoms and molecules are vibrating and rotating with the same freedom and activity as the suns and planets." "Vibratory or wave motion is a general method in nature of transmitting energy. Sound is the most familiar instance of this. Light is another and electricity a third."

"Wireless telegraphy employs the principle of sympathetic vibration."

"The secret of telepathic communications lies in sympathetic vibrations between the brains of two persons perfectly attuned and harmonized with each other."

That is scientific; unnecessary to introduce a spirit to explain communications. But Mr. Dawbarn employs this law of nature to vibrate spirits out of what little sense they may have had.

When, through the Chicago publication, I pointed out the absurdities of Dawbarn vibrations, he endeavors to reply, and said through the same journal: "W. F. Jamieson calls this experience 'being vibrated out of their senses.' He is wrong. The senses are there, and alive as ever. It is the memory that is vibrated into utter silence."

Just so. When a spirit does not know enough to know his own name, as he admits, that spirit lacks the most common kind of common sense.

Mr. Dawbarn is remarkable for verbosity, as will be seen; but is interesting. He says: "The ghost story told by the flicker of the Yule log has had a weird attraction for the superstitious mind. If it happened to be a stormy night, with creaks and groans pervading the old homestead, and possibly scratchings and rapping adding to the horror, the nibbling of a mouse would at last open churchyard graves for the frightened listeners, as they scurried to bed. As a matter of fact, and studied in broad daylight, a ghost did not seem so very dreadful. Even suppose he had acquired the startling habit of trotting around with his head under his arm, the anatomical objection would be seriously pointed out by the daylight observer. As a matter of history he is usually seen gliding about in darksome loneliness, as if he were meditating on something rather ghoulish in the long ago."

Well, that fairly describes a large portion of Spiritualism except the fright. Says he: "We manufacture ghosts by the thousand now-a-days, in a few minutes. Both accidents and battles supply the raw material to an overstocked market. The old-fashioned ghost is nearly crowded out."

Doubtless that is a fact.

"A really popular ghost must, in this era, do something more than move tables, compel the automatic pencil, or even whisper through the lips of a shut-eyed medium. Such manifestations demand more imagination than is possessed by the public of today. The audience is unable to realize that a ghost is really present. But darken your room until the waving of cheap muslin, bespangled and touched with luminous paint, satisfies the fond believer, and you have the sort of thing the dear public will pay its dollar to see. No imagination is needed. There is the ghost."

Take "imagination" out of Spiritualism and what is there remaining?

"As we said, there is the ghost, and everybody knows a ghost in the dark. The trouble begins when you expose it to light."

That is just as I found it, always: ghosts and light do not "vibrate" harmoniously! "It is quite evident that whether real or artificial, it objects to the light, and for the most part protests against any and all conditions that would protect the dear public from being cheated."

That is a fact; Spiritualism "objects to the light," and when I, in the sixties, began to throw light on the dark seance, Spiritualists over all the land bitterly denounced my efforts to "protect the dear public." They insisted that it was our duty to "protect the dear medium," and they say the same today. As for the "dear public"—it is big enough to take care of itself.

Says Mr. Dawbarn:

"Such is commercial 'materialization' as practiced today, and as practiced for the last score of years. It means ghost visible, with the midnight horror left out. It has begun to be universally believed that ghosts furnished to order of visitors with a dollar are dubious, very dubious."

Remember, he is a Spiritualist. He says further:

"Cover the medium with netting nailed to the floor, and they do not appear. Exclude the confederate, and the gods are absent. But such interference is styled 'persecution,' and perhaps it is. It is a serious question whether those who cheat and those who love to be cheated can lawfully be kept apart."

"Those who love to be cheated." They have them, as Mr. Dawbarn asserts.

Many Spiritualists argue that to cover the medium with netting is to cover him, or her, with suspicion, which "spoils the conditions."

He makes an unpleasant comparison: "I cannot see that the general effect is any worse than the game played with three thimbles and a pea; or the popular three card monte."

"The ghost fakir is a spider; the dear public furnish him with flies."

And this is said, not by an enemy, but a popular friend of Spiritualism. He continues to enlighten us:

"It is because I believe there are 'hellish verities' that no government can reach that I am proposing to help the reader to a little careful examination of so-called 'materialization.'"

"I count materialization, when genuine, as the very lowest phase of 'spirit return.' During his earth life man the mortal is making for himself a 'thought body.' When the body is worn by the returning spirit it is composed of atoms, blending into molecules, as in earth life, and hence proportionately subject to attraction and repulsion as is the body of today. Its density is a question of degree of vibration. When death renders the old form no longer habitable for man, he is not annihilated, or spirit return would not be today a recognized fact of nature. He therefore has an existence, in form, for matter without form is impossible. As matter increases its rate of vibration it gradually passes beyond mortal sense."

Yet he denied that he ever said that. Some who undertake to discuss have the unhappy habit of denying their own words.

He adds: "When man discovered that his sense was only vibration of matter, his old superstition died."

"Vibration," worked to death by this author, appears to be the death of Spiritualism.

Who knows anything about Dawbarn's "thought body"? How about the infant that dies before it begins to think?

He next asserts: "We also discovered that nature has an eternal law by which each personality has its own memory recorded in its own vibrations. Applying this fact to spirit return we discover that the Ego will have, practically, a new personality for each mortal body it controls as its medium."

What a hodge-podge!

"We all know that materializations are possible under conditions very different from those of the dollar seance."

Do "we all know that"? If professional mediums manufacture their own materialized ghosts, what assurance have we that in private they are genuine?

Says Mr. Dawbarn: "We see Professor Crookes watching Katie King night after night in his own home. Probably no more favorable conditions could be offered for such phenomena, yet we hear nothing of spirit knowledge and wisdom brought to him by his visitor from the unseen life. And Katie herself is represented as claiming that her appearance was for her own personal spirit advancement. We see that unless she was herself very close to the vibrations of earth life she could not, and probably would not, have cultivated that form of 'spirit return.'"

Not very complimentary to Katie. Professor Crookes himself, as I show in a previous chapter of this work, Volume I, "Scientists Searching Spiritualism," speaks in glowing terms of her angelic nature and beauty.

But Brother Dawbarn says: "A hellish verity which is the very essence of the form materializations of today." "The student will now have perceived that 'form materialization' must, at its very best, be the lowest phase of spirit return, because offering the best possible conditions for those to return who can do the most mischief. He will have noticed that the identification of such a form is an absurdity, since, even if his loved one should be willing to be besmeared with such matter once, she will be forged ever after, or as long as his dollars hold out. And from the opening thus given to fraudulent spirits may be traced the downfall of many a medium who sought development with honesty of purpose, but became the prey of the invisible sharpers."

And he is the Spiritualists' own "brilliant" witness.

Mr. Dawbarn asserts with the voice of authority that "materialized spirits" (if there are such things) return to "do the most mischief."

Are they fit associates for the men, women and children of this world? Who wants to be on terms of sociability with "fraudulent spirits," as Mr. Dawbarn describes them, "invisible sharpers," who ought to be avoided? So, if spirits can communicate they are the cause of "the downfall of many a medium." Fortunate was I to escape their clutches many years ago. But Spiritualists everywhere teach that spirits can and do communicate, millions of them, and the result is, as confessed by the ablest minds among Spiritualists, that throngs of "sharpers" press around the earth. What a pestiferous crowd, how terrible that evil-minded company!

Worse, if possible, than on earth. Dawbarn says: "In earth life we live and manifest to each other amid vibrations that accord with mortal sense. Yet the man of pure thought is separated by a gulf from the man whose thought is impure. They cannot affiliate, and so they drift apart. Thought is intelligence in vibratory movement, and, like the atom, finds its own harmony in association. The sensual animal man lives to gratify mortal sense, and is of the earth, earthy. Such thought as he evolves is expressed in matter vibrating to his use. The spiritual man aspires to evolve a higher manhood in which love shall triumph over lust. So we see the vibratory expressions of their several natures hold them far apart."

"In form materialization we see the matter of our every-day life recreated into visible human form by thought power. That form represents the very vibrations from which the advancing spirit is seeking to free himself. It also represents the very form to which the earthbound spirit clings, for it is built up of vibrations amidst which lie his old sensual gratifications. So when I assert that the public materialization seance, if free from mortal fraud, consists largely of 'hellish verities,' I mean that most of the spirits present are seeking their own sensual gratification, no matter who may suffer. The essence of fraud is sensual gratification, and the gross sensualist lives at the level of fraud in his earth life. Death makes him invisible to mortal eye, but so close does he remain to mortal sense that his touch sends a thrill through the sensitive as he comes shoulder to shoulder in the crowd, or plays foul tricks in the dark seance. The embrace, the caress, which the sinner thinks are heaven-sent joys, may be, and in the public seance usually are, 'hellish verities.'"

"It must be so, for in the necessary conditions for such materializations is everything repellent to a pure spirit and attractive to one who is impure. It is at such times that a cruel development of the sinner goes on that often means worldly ruin, and worse. The weakling not knowing his own sensitiveness, invites such spirits into his inner life. Human wrecks presently tell the tale of woe to those who have ears to hear."

If all this is so, is Spiritualism a blessing? In its first years there was nothing of this kind, and when "materialization" was announced we believed that its demonstrations would bring positive proof over the entire earth; but our friend Dawbarn virtually bids farewell to Spiritualism's crowning proof, materialization. He says: "As a farewell thought to this article I would urge upon the reader that materialization of the human form is a phase of spirit phenomena which the wise Spiritualist will not encourage even by his own fireside, since its conditions are so unfavorable for the return of those he holds most dear."

This is what Christian people have been advising for fifty years—to shun it.

In another article, in the same journal, Mr. Dawbarn says: "The most experienced Spiritualist is often dismayed and disheartened at the limitations that haunt his phenomena."

I should think he would be. What becomes of his thousands of platform and private "tests"? He says:

"For instance, when Shakespeare is announced as his visitor he invariably discovers that the wit and wisdom of the spirit will not overshadow the unlearned conversation of his neighbor, John Smith. This same sad fact applies to the 'return' of any and every spirit, whatever his own renown for special knowledge and talent in earth life. The invisible scientist may apparently influence some uneducated medium to talk with a learned twang that is abnormal, but the science exhibited rarely reaches the text-book level and never equals that of the learned specialist."

That corroborates Henry Ward Beecher: "It gives one a terrible set-back to go to the spirit world."

Says Brother Dawbarn: "Coming down a little closer into every-day life, we find our friends and relatives often making a most unpalatable hash of truth. They have hard work when they first return to remember their names, and it is only after the track has been smoothed by 'suggestion' that they make any real progress. There is plenty of the abnormal in such phenomena, but almost no proof that the spirit brings back any higher manhood than he left behind. Usually his progress is invisible to the mortal investigator. Is it any wonder the world smiles?"

No, Charles, it is no wonder.

"It has almost ceased to ridicule, but it is asking, and has the right to ask, 'What is the good of it all?'"

"The Spiritualist has been gradually getting into cramped quarters. He has built his new 'ism' on phenomena, and every new phase is ushered in with a solemn admonition to 'behold another grand manifestation of spirit power.' If the unseen prestidigitator produces a new trick, the sacred cause experiences a boom."

How can Charles Dawbarn have the least faith in such a system? He continues to make these damaging admissions:

"Almost everything claimed for the spirits of the dead 'can apparently, with just as much propriety, be claimed for spirits of the living mortal.'"

Mr. Dawbarn made a close study of Spiritualism and concludes that "almost everything claimed for the spirits of the dead" is contrary to fact—"apparently." The "spirits of the living mortal" are too officious. Spiritualists in general seem to fear that a critical investigation might upset their charming philosophy!

Says Mr. Dawbarn: "One heals in the name of Spiritualism. Another healer who denies 'spirit return' is quite as successful. The prophet and test giver may be only a psychometrist; while clairvoyance and clairaudience are undoubtedly uncultivated faculties inhering to every mortal. And when at last we come to the fact, that after many years of most careful investigation the Society for Psychical Research acknowledges that it has found traces of independent intelligence, through the mediumship of Mrs. Piper, that can only be explained by 'spirit return,' we are still left face to face with the old mystery. In these acknowledged cases of spirit return we have the same old limitations and imperfections, till the weary skeptic exclaims, 'at best there is but a grain of wheat to a bushel of chaff.'"

"The experienced Spiritualist knows in his heart that something is wrong."

Yes, truly, we are still left face to face with the old mystery, "a grain of wheat to a bushel of chaff," even in what is called genuine phenomena. Spiritualism is undermining mankind's faith in immortality itself. Brother Dawbarn, too, sees the danger: "Such are the problems that are demanding solution. The patient will die unless they are solved." "The facts must be traced and studied right down to the very foundation of the movement if we would discover how much of truth, and how much of imagination we have blended in our old belief."

How very few Spiritualists test their system in this way. The leading Spiritualist paper, The Progressive Thinker, keeps this notice standing at the head of its editorial columns: "Give us the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Does it practice it?

Mr. R. A. Dague, a very gifted writer, says: "Spiritualism is the champion defender of free speech, a free press, religious liberty."

It dare not stand by these lofty claims. As the years go by, the fact becomes plainer that spirits cannot possibly communicate with the people of this world. They cannot remember a thing that happened on earth, according to its most favored authors, like Mr. Dawbarn. If these authors tell the truth, as they most likely strive to do, they must confess, at least, that "dead men tell no tales." Says Dawbarn:

"Death changes all vibrations to such an extent that the spirit organism becomes invisible to mortal eye."

"Therefore death also destroys all memories of earth life."

"When I had thus dared to enter the very Arcanum of nature I was stunned by the awful truth. I went over the ground again and again, but if memory be a matter of vibration, there can be no escape."

Death "destroys all memories of earth life," says Mr. Dawbarn.

The teaching of Spiritualism in its early years was that death makes no change in the individual; that the spirit merely moves out of its old body into its new one. Mr. Dawbarn obtains a different revelation, which "stunned" him. "Death also destroys all memories of earth life." No wonder we get no "communications" from the denizens of a spirit world. It is de-

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

clared that even the noblest characters on earth have not the least recollection of their good deeds when they become spirits. Says Mr. Dawbarn:

"We see the philanthropist brightening the lives and winning the love of hundreds of his fellow mortals. He is pointed to as an ideal man and a statue erected to his honor. But he cannot carry with him one memory of his own earth experience. His Ego is that of one who loves his fellow man, and with such associations he is, wherever he may be, in what we call heaven."

"The new personality thus destroys memory, but retains the effect of every mortal's thought life. The acts are all that tell the tale on earth today. It is the thought vibration that holds the register in the life of tomorrow. This law necessarily applies to every mortal, and to every grade of thought that can produce a vibratory reaction on the soul of man."

So, our "spirit friends" are mere simpletons!

On the part of the spirit he says: "All memory of personal experience has gone." "Thus a loving mother, torn from her children, can have no memory of the sad experiences."

What a bright mother! Nevertheless, he is accepted as a Spiritualist, a brilliant one. He explains: "No matter how delightful his intercourse with father, mother, wife or child, he knows that a visit to some other medium may upset it all. At best, it is only after a number of sittings that he gets really satisfactory proofs of identity."

Now, candidly, does he ever get a "really satisfactory" proof of identity?

Even Mr. Dawbarn is constrained to say: "With such facts, like worms at the root of their faith, Spiritualists are shouting that spirit return is a glorious religion, and that the grandeur of its revelations will presently pervade and reform the world. Meanwhile the time-worn Spiritualist finds so little of which he can be proud in the public offerings of 'spirit return' that he, sooner or later, either returns to the church pew under some liberal preacher, or else drifts along with a cool indifference that is the final stage for a belief that is gradually freezing to death."

"So little of which he can be proud."

That is true. Spiritualists were led to think a positive demonstration had at last come to the human race: that spirits departed had returned and been identified.

The "public offerings of 'spirit return'" to the "time-worn Spiritualist" fail to satisfy him, and he goes back to the church pew, or becomes indifferent.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. The announcement that we have it is sufficient.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

"THE CHRIST"

A Critical Review and Analysis of the Evidences of His Existence.

By JOHN E. REMSBURG

Author of "The Bible," "Six Historic Americans," etc.

In deciding who Jesus was we are compelled to choose between the character drawn with scores of divergences in the synoptics, and that other character which is elaborated by the gospel of John; for nothing is plainer than that though Matthew, Mark and Luke may have the same Jesus in mind, theirs is not the Jesus of John. Little of the Jesus limned in one of the gospels is preserved in the others, except the name. With the name left out would anybody be sure that all the gospel writers were writing of the same man? What resemblance is there between the Jesus Christ of the synoptics and the Christ Jesus of Paul that does not subsist between either of them and any other "messiah" known to the history of religion?

One who begins Mr. Remsburg's book with curiosity to learn what can be said for the myth theory is likely to end with the conviction that this theory alone is supported by probability.

There are chapters on Christ's Real Existence Impossible; Silence of Contemporary Writers; Christian Evidence; Infancy of Christ; The Resurrection of Christ; Character and Teachings; The Christ a Myth; Sources of the Christ Myth. THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizer Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

IF JESUS CAME TO BOSTON

Thoughts About It Prompted by the Supposition of an Itinerant Evangelist.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

Billy Sunday, known as the Rev. William A. Sunday, D.D., wishes to know what Bostonians would do if Jesus came to Boston. I think that Bostonians could stand it if Jesus could. But before we consider the question which Rev. Mr. Sunday asks, let us look at this character called Jesus and see whether there is enough of him to stand the journey to Boston.

We find in a portion of the Bible four so-called gospels. No one knows who wrote a single line of those four gospels. No one knows when a single line of those four gospels was written. No one knows one single historical fact connected with the authorship of those four gospels. The authenticity and genuineness of those gospels are more than seriously questioned by the general obscurity which surrounds them; they are absolutely denied. The so-called gospels were written anonymously. From the latest criticism of the highest scholarship the four gospels are forgeries. Matthew, Mark, Luke and John are the same as Tom, Dick and Harry. They are the names of nobodies. They are not fishermen; they are strawmen.

To begin with, we must recollect that the scenes in the gospels were enacted nearly two thousand years ago, for the most part in out-of-the-way places and by exceedingly obscure individuals. Contemporaneous history does not mention a single one of the gospel followers of Jesus, and is absolutely silent with respect to Jesus himself. So you see we have no reliable account of what was said and done by the hero of the gospel stories.

But for the purpose of considering the query of Mr. Sunday, we will take the gospel narratives at their face value. What kind of a person do we find in these narratives? What does he say, and what does he do?

There are just two ways of judging a man or a god—by his words and by his deeds. And there is just one standard of judgment to which either must submit. Man knows only what he has learned. His experience furnishes him with his criterion of criticism. What he calls right he has found by living to be right. What he calls true he has found to fit the facts of life and experience.

I wish to say that if Jesus came to Boston he would not have a chance for one week, at least, to ask any questions that Mr. Sunday puts in his mouth. He would be kept busy answering questions for that length of time. And; besides, should he begin his catechising, he would doubtless be told by some people that it was none of his business what they did.

Christian ministers, and Mr. Sunday in particular, need to understand that Jesus has no claim upon the intelligent, educated persons of this age; that he is neither their master nor their savior, and that his real relation to mankind today is simply that of any other dead person.

When we are told that Jesus was not a man, we admit it. When we are told that Jesus was a god, we deny it. Jesus was a myth. All the stories about him are legendary. We have not one little bit of a fact to clothe Jesus with.

Let us suppose that Jesus is coming to Boston. Will he come here in a Packard or a Ford, or will he come to our city as he made his advent into Jerusalem, on the back of an ass?

Now if Jesus comes to Boston, what kind of an individual shall we have with us? Let us state the truth. We shall have a person who had no human father. What would such a person look like? Would he have more than a half-human appearance? We have the word of the angel of the Lord, whatever that is, that the Holy Ghost was the father of Jesus. Can you believe it? I can't. There is a liar somewhere in this story of the conception of Jesus. There is no such person as a Holy Ghost, never was and never will be. We do not know the man back of this ghost, but there was one, if Jesus was ever born of woman. But Jesus is not to be blamed for his birth. He has not to answer for that. And every man should forgive his mother, if every woman does not.

The first thing that Jesus did in public was to go from Galilee to the river Jordan to be baptized. When he came out of the water we read that "the heavens were opened unto him and he saw the spirit of God descending like a dove and lighting upon him." The only real thing in this picture is the dove; the rest is religious hysteria or a religious lie.

It is related in the so-called gospel of Matthew that its hero went into the wilderness to be with God, but he was met by the devil. These two Dromios fought a duel, not with swords but with words, a sort of theological duel, in which Jesus overcame his adversary. I say this on the strength of the story, not having heard from the defeated candidate. Where there is a devil mentioned we are not getting the truth, nor where angels are spoken of. Man is the only devil on earth and woman the only angel.

One of the first questions which Bostonians would ask of this Galilean peasant, and which they want answered, is this: Where is the kingdom of heaven? Two thousand years ago Jesus said that this kingdom was "at hand," which means near; but no one has seen it around yet. If Jesus came to Boston he would be asked to explain his mistake. Any orthodox clergyman could supply the missing link between what Jesus predicted and what really happened, but the fact would remain that the kingdom foretold did not make an appearance.

Millions of persons have looked for heaven, but no one has found it. Between you and me it is a place in the kingdom of imagination. And that is where hell would be found also.

Jesus has been received as a superman, or as a person above man. He has been looked upon as possessing a higher knowledge than had been acquired by men, and all of the statements attributed to him by the gospel writers have been accepted as truth. This is a great error. The extravagant language put in the mouth of the Nazarene preacher means to this age only foolish speech. It is the language of the novelist, not of the historian. The trouble is that Jesus has been painted as a real character, as a person who was born and lived on earth, whereas there is not a particle of evidence in all the literature of the world that he ever stepped foot on our globe.

The distinctive teaching of the hero of the four gospels is that there is a father in heaven who is the God of mankind. The first question which I should ask of Jesus, if he came to Boston, would be this: Where is your father in heaven? Where is this God who loves the children of men? You have told us about him, but we do not see any signs of him. I should say to Jesus: Be honest now, and tell us what your father in heaven has done to show his love for human beings. Does he do any more for men, women and children than he does for the beasts, the birds and the fishes?

Teaching a father in heaven, a god of love and mercy, is to my mind wicked and cruel. And more than that, it is teaching a falsehood. If the life of everything on this earth shows one fact, it is this: There is no divine providence.

Jesus taught that his father in heaven would answer the prayers of men. If one were to pray God to destroy the Roman Catholic church, would God answer that prayer? If the Roman Catholic priest were to pray God to kill all the Freethinkers in the world, would God answer that prayer? The work of the church is not the work of God. It is time to get that foolish belief out of the minds of men. I know of no greater cause of rejoicing than the fact that God does not answer the prayers of men. If he did, no man's life would be safe for one hour.

The Christian world professes to believe that Jesus came from God to save mankind from hell; that he died on a cross to atone for the sins of men; that he rose from the dead to prove his power over the grave. All of such faith is unnecessary, as there is no hell and no need of any atonement. No man needs to be saved by Jesus or by anybody else. The only thing that a man needs to do who is doing wrong is to stop doing wrong and commence to do right.

There have been a great many false things said of Jesus and a great many foolish things. He has been called the Prince of Peace. But it would be truer to call him the king of war. The man who comes with a sword in his hand is not bearing the olive branch of peace. Let him break his sword and the world will gladly listen to his message. Jesus, according to the words put into his mouth by the author of the gospel of Matthew, came not to bring peace and happiness into the home, but, rather, division and strife and hatred. He came to set a son against his father, a daughter against her mother. No mission could be meaner than that. But the climax of his ministry was reached when he declared: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me, and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." If Jesus came to Boston and made that speech in the presence of the fathers and mothers of this city he would be given just one hour to leave for his father's mansion or anywhere else, with the admonition never to show his head around here again. The person who would make such a declaration as that is not deserving of the love of any human being. The sweetest love in this world is the love of a parent for a child, and the holiest love on earth is the love which binds together the hearts of men and women. Only an insane person or a person corroded with egotism and selfishness could make such a claim as Jesus made.

The notion that Jesus was not speaking as a man, but as one who was divine, cannot be allowed. We must not forget that two thousand years ago gods were made out of men and enthroned in marble greatness for the worship of mankind.

If Jesus came to Boston he would be asked if he was the son of God. And should he answer in the affirmative, he would be requested to show his divine credentials. If he could show nothing better than the accounts of his New Testament miracles he would be told that such stories did not pass current in this age. According to the gospel record, the first individuals to call Jesus the son of God were "two possessed with devils." The last individuals to do so will probably be of the same kind.

The only way to accept the peasant of Galilee is to accept him as the work of an artist. Extravagant pictures of men have been painted in all ages. Jesus was given to the world as an ideal, the best that had been, together with the best that was to be. But as an ideal he is outgrown. Miracles today do not adorn man, they deform him. Dozens of persons, who were given gods for fathers, embellish the pages of literature. The superhuman has been pictured to make man more human, nobler, gentler, kinder. I would as soon believe that the marble Venus of Milo was once a living woman as that the Jesus of the gospels was once a living man.

Cut out of the story of the Galilean preacher all of the impossible things, and what is left not only lacks interest to this generation, but it lacks personality. Jesus is a fabulous person. He is a miracle-man. The hero of the gospels as we have him today in the Bible is all the Jesus that ever existed. He was created by the philosophy of Greece and the fanatical imagination of Israel. One looked for a god; the other looked for a Christ. In the collaboration we get simply an impossible man.

I have always had the greatest respect for men who respected their mothers. A man who could forget all the agonies which a mother endured to give him life is, in my opinion, a man unworthy the love and honor of mankind. There is more than one kind of love, but the love that suffers the love that endures pain and anguish for another, is above all others to be given the heart's deepest affection. When that love calls upon a son or daughter, the only response should be the most willing obedience. What shall we say of Jesus, who, when his mother wished to speak to him, said: "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" That one incident in the life of the Nazarene shows to me that he was wanting in proper respect, whether he was human or divine. How would a god treat a woman who was his mother? No worship of his father in heaven could atone for the neglect of his mother on earth. I would put men and women, the only ones in this wide, mysterious universe to respond to our calls for help, the only ones to answer our prayers for affection, above all the angels—yea, above all the gods worshiped by men.

If Jesus came to Boston, which of her churches would he attend? Would he go to the cathedral of Cardinal O'Connell? If he did, and saw the cardinal in full plumage, he would repeat his words in the fifth verse of the twenty-third chapter of the gospel according to Matthew: "All their works they do to be seen of men; they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments." After that, Jesus would say to the cardinal: Lay aside your fuss and feathers before you can follow me.

Jesus might go to hear Bishop Lawrence, but it is more than likely that he would say, after listening to the bishop: "There is too much red tape in your services to suit me."

There is not a church in Boston that would give to Jesus the right hand of fellowship. Not one of them would ask him into its pulpit. He probably would spend his Sundays riding in the trolleys or going to the parks and museums or speaking from the platforms of the workmen.

If Jesus came to Boston, I would ask him why he did not get married when he was on earth and make a home for his wife and children and live like a human being. It strikes me that a person who had the welfare of the human race at heart would set a good example for men and women to follow.

As far as the four gospels reveal the life of Jesus, there was little about it to attract a sensible, enlightened man. Going around the country more like a tramp than a worthy citizen, associating with the lowest classes in the community, is not the way to inspire confidence or win the respect of intelligent men.

Jesus spoke of his second coming on earth, but he did not leave a single thing to prove his first coming. The Christian church would give all it can beg, borrow and collect in its hat to have one authenticated article that Jesus left in the world. I do not forget any of the old trumpery carted around by the Roman Catholic church, as all such stuff smells of fraud and imposition.

But if Jesus came to Boston, I should ask him if he recognized his grandmother Ann's old shin-bone, or arm bone, that the priests of Romanism have been exhibiting about the country for faith and revenue. The two big words of Romanism are faith and revenue, but the biggest one is revenue.

When one touches a miracle it is like touching a soap-bubble. You burst it. Miracles can be talked about, but they have never been performed. Anybody can tell a miracle-story, but what we want in this age is to see a miracle. If Jesus came to Boston I should ask him to turn some water into wine; cure a case of infantile paralysis; feed a few thousand men and women on a box of sardines and a package of Uneda Biscuits, and have a barrelful left after the feast; still a tempest in Boston harbor by a whispered word, and go out to Mt. Auburn and raise a man from the dead. A decent miracle is afraid to show its head today, so I suppose we should not get much enlightenment on the subject from the miracle-worker of Nazareth.

But there is one thing I would like to know. I would like to know how the devil looks. And if anyone should be an authority on this subject, surely the person who conquered the big devil of the wilderness ought to be. I should also like to learn what angels are. Angels, we are told, never grow old. They are the same yesterday, today and a thousand years from today. I don't ask to see a regiment of these creatures. One will do. But think of an angel living thousands of years and never growing old or gray. I wonder if an angel ever takes a bath or changes his linen!

There is one thing that I should like to tell Jesus, and that is, that I should think more of him if he had talked less about devils and angels and more about what is real and sensible!

This age above all things else wants facts, wants truth. All the churches ever built by man for God are not worth as much to the world as the splendid achievements of man upon which civilization rests. Man is striving to be real, to be true, to get rid of falsehood. He does not want to be cheated any longer. He wants to make his own life truer and better, and to save future generations from the lies of the past. He knows that Jesus is only a myth, only a theological savior; that the New Testament is not historical and that science has reduced all religion to superstition.

Apropos of all this, I wonder how much of religious teaching man is justified in believing, especially when not a single divine character ever had an existence, when heaven and hell have never been located, and when not a single Bible incident can be proved to have taken place. Do people realize on what an unsubstantial foundation the Christian religion rests? I wish to speak plainly. On what ground does man say that there is a God? On what ground does man say that there is a devil? On what ground does man say that there is a heaven and a hell? Religious things are not real things. Religious characters are not real characters. Religious places are not real places. Now, nothing higher than man has lived on this earth, and every person superior to man that has been given existence by religion has been a fictitious person. Every character that has been painted as superhuman is paint.

Another thing. Man today is superior to the man of the past. Humanity in this century stands on the highest pinnacle which it has ever reached. The men of this age have better facilities for acquiring knowledge, for discovering facts, for seeing things as they are, than the men of any previous age.

Can any living man demonstrate the existence of a Father in heaven, of a God who loves the children of men? Can any living man prove the existence of the devil? Can any living man tell where heaven is, or where hell is? Can any living man perform a miracle?

How much, then, of the religious teaching of the past are we justified in believing? How much of the Bible is worthy the serious attention of modern intelligence?

If there is a God in this infinite universe who talked with Moses and Joshua, why does he not talk with Woodrow Wilson or Theodore Roosevelt? If there is a God in this wondrous universe who could walk in the Garden of Eden, why could he not take a stroll on Boston Common? It won't do. God, if he exists, can do as much as ever he could. But he does nothing today. Did he ever do anything?

We have a Hebrew Bible. It is accepted as the word of God, but not on the authority of God. What did the Hebrew bring down from the past? As far as I can see, nothing but figures of speech. Is the Lord God of the Bible a living God? If so, where does he live?

Is Olympus the home of the father-god of Greece? Not any longer. Jupiter was once worshipped as the mighty god of a great people. Where is he today? Dead. He died when his last worshiper died. So, too, will Jehovah and Jesus die, and these Christian gods, like all other deities, will be buried in the graves of their worshipers.

The busy world shoves angrily aside
The man who stands with arms akimbo set,
Until occasion tell him what to do;
And he who waits to have his task marked out,
Shall die and leave his errand unfulfilled.

I have no respect for that self-boasting charity which neglects all objects of commiseration near and around it, but goes to the end of the earth in search of misery, for the purpose of talking about it.—George Mason.

A Trip to the National Capital.

My first visit to our national capital was a short one, made on a trip eastward in 1895. My first one in the capacity of a lecturer was in March, 1896. In 1904, while on a business trip to the Southern states, I stopped off for a few hours. Since then many changes have taken place in Washington. The old railway stations have been torn down, as have many other buildings, because the government needed and purchased the land. Hence, when I alighted from a Baltimore and Ohio train at the beautiful new union station early Sunday morning, January 7, little that was familiar greeted my eyes, except the Capitol.

I had been engaged to lecture before the Washington Secular League on this date, as well as on January 14. I at once, as directed, repaired to the home of the treasurer of the league, Mr. H. H. Burwell, who was to have charge of my comfort while in the city. This obligation Mr. Burwell discharged faithfully and well. He had attended the Lexington, Va., University while Robert E. Lee was its president, and I found him at all times to be not only a genial but well-informed gentleman.

The hour for the meeting to start was 3 P. M., when the League's hall in the Pythian Temple contained a good audience, and after the meeting had proceeded for a short time was filled. The first to greet me upon entering the hall was the president, Mr. John D. Bradley. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are familiar with this gentleman by reputation. At first a Seventh Day Adventist, he, like nearly all others who read and think and are honest, became a Rationalist. Mr. Bradley, with Prof. Hyland C. Kirk and Mr. Burwell, form the League's Committee on Legislation. Their duties are to watch for and oppose all Sunday laws and other vicious religious legislation that might be attempted in Congress. Well have they done their work. Mr. Bradley's speech before the Committee on Postal Affairs in opposition to the Fitzgerald and Gallivan press muzzling bills was unquestionably the best of the occasion. He is a splendid speaker, and at the League meeting after a few remarks introduced me to the audience.

My subject was "The Struggle for Freethought, Free Press and Free Speech in the United States." After the lecture came the discussion, which was interesting and in the main profitable. The League is strictly a Freethought organization, its object being to advance the Nine Demands of Liberalism and promulgate the principles of Rationalism. Cranks with but one wheel in their heads, and that buzzing at all times, are not permitted to come here and advertise themselves and their ideas. When they come and speak they must talk on the subject under discussion. They must make no such impertinent remarks as "Why don't you discuss economics?" or "What is the use wasting time discussing these religious questions?" and then tell what subjects ought to be lectured upon. When this happens, Mr. Bradley, who is one of the best chairmen I ever saw, raps for order. He tells the offender that he must speak on the topic of the day or take his seat. He tells him that if he does not approve of the issues handled by the League, he may go to meetings where he will hear something in which he is interested, or may hire a hall and hold a meeting of his own.

That harmonizes with the idea of conducting a Freethought organization that has been mine for years. I am not saying that the discussion of economics and other questions is not needed; but I do say it is the height of impudence for any individual not interested in the Rationalist movement, generally because he does not read and has not taken pains to inform himself of its necessity, to come to a Rationalist meeting and berate the speaker and the society because they do not devote their attention to his particular hobby.

On Monday I spent most of my time in the Capitol, and in the evening had the pleasure of taking dinner with Mr. Bradley at his home, and meeting his excellent wife and little daughter. Here I met Dr. Alonzo T. Jones, the well-known Seventh Day Adventist, who has made so many friends among Freethinkers by his opposition to ecclesiasticism in government. I had not seen Dr. Jones for twenty years. He spoke in the warmest terms of the late Samuel P. Putnam, on whom he looked as a personal friend.

On Tuesday, the 9th, Mr. Bradley was kind enough to leave his business to show me persons and places of interest. We first went to the gallery of the Senate. What impressed me here was the lack of dignity in appearance of that body compared with former years when I have visited it. Then they all wore long frock-coats. Now, in their apparel, they resemble an aggregation of business men. We can well overlook this if they give us better laws. A great question of national interest was under discussion, the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, a bill for which had already been passed. Senator Shepard had introduced an amendment to submit the question to the people of the District, and as this amendment was to be voted on that day, the galleries were crowded. I am not speaking in favor of liquor, but I do believe in self-government; therefore, as to whether it should or should not be sold in a given locality is a matter the people have a right to decide by their votes. The chief speaker in opposition to the amendment was Senator Hoke Smith of Georgia. The senator contended that under the Constitution the District is to be governed by Congress; therefore the people should have no voice. Well, the people pay half the taxes; should they be deprived of all choice? Under the present law, the entire control of the sale of liquors is delegated by Congress to an excise board. If Congress is empowered to turn the matter over to the few men composing this board, why has it not the power to submit it to the citizens, whose homes, property and business interests are here? And when the Constitution specified that the District is to be governed by Congress, it did not mean that the people should have no voice. Washington and its environs were formerly a portion of the states of Maryland and Virginia. The Constitution meant, I think, that government of the District should be controlled by Congress and that the individual states should not interfere with it. Senator Smith said he would no more submit the question of selling liquor to a popular vote than he would submit the right to steal. He then caused a laugh by saying that no man liked a glass of wine better than himself, but that there were some people who ought to be prevented from buying it. That is the spirit of most suppressionists. They want a law to prohibit somebody else but not themselves. There being a tie vote and Vice-President Marshall being absent, the amendment was lost.

We spent a short time in the gallery of the House. Owing to its great increase in members, due to the growth of population in the country, there is no longer space for each member to have a desk. They have only opera chairs arranged in a semicircular form. Speaker Clark presides with dignity and firmness. There was no business of importance under consideration this day. A striking figure in the House is "Cyclone" Davis of Texas, who was last fall defeated for reelection. Mr. Bradley pointed out to me Congressman Gallivan of Boston, Mass., whose press-muzzling bill made him notorious when otherwise he would be unknown. Not only was Gallivan's bill a monstrosity, but I must say that he himself is the homeliest man in the House. We spent some time in Statuary Hall, at one time the hall of the House. We did not succeed in seeing the Supreme Court in session, but twice saw the judges file out to their private room. The Supreme Court room is the old Senate chamber. Here Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and Douglass made their great speeches and Brooks assaulted Sumner.

On Wednesday evening I was entertained by Mr. and Mrs. J. W. McBurney. On Thursday I had an appointment to meet Mr. James A. Hennesy, who took me to his home in Brookland. TRUTH SEEKER readers know his writings under the nom-de-plume of Francois Thane. Mr. Hennesy is an old-time Freethinker. Almost until the wee hours of morning we discussed men with whom we were both acquainted, some of whom have been dead many years. We discussed the drama and literature in general. Mr. Hennesy has recently written a grammar published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York. His graphophone records include the greatest of musicians and singers, but there is one that he puts above price. It is the voice of Robert G. Ingersoll. Mr. Hennesy's son, Hugh Hennesy, is the distinguished cartoonist, some of whose work THE TRUTH SEEKER has presented. I only wish it were able to present some every week.

Brookland is the seat of the great Catholic University. Priests from all over the country come and go there. On the street car that I took in returning to the city the only other occupants were two of these gentry. I stepped in and sat directly opposite them. As my face is smooth-shaven: as I wear a black hat and a black overcoat, which on a cold night was buttoned to my neck and the collar turned up, the two "holy fathers" when I took my seat looked at me and smiled familiarly. They thought I was a brother priest! To disillusion them I unbuttoned my overcoat. When they saw that I wore no ecclesiastical uniform their countenances changed, and they arose and went to the other end of the car, where they continued their conversation. Years ago, when the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER wrote a column called "Observations," he cracked a joke about my long face, but I never dreamed it would get me into trouble like this.

There is much to be seen in Washington that I have not covered in my three visits. One thing I saw this time was the Washington monument, which, shaped like Cleopatra's needle, is in height equal to fifty stories. It was begun in 1848 and finished in 1884. I ascended by the elevator in the center, but walked down, wishing to inspect the stones presented for the structure by all the states of the union and all the nations of the world. They made me think that the "Father of his Country" was the most honored and respected man who has ever lived on this globe. I would not like, however, to spend any time here on a hot day, as the monument has but four windows and these are at the apex. I must not fail to mention the radical book and news store kept at 305 Seventh street, N. W., by Mr. Burwell's son, H. S. Burwell. Here THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Melting Pot, as well as Freethought books and pamphlets, are openly exposed for sale in the window and on the counter.

On Sunday, the 14th, we had the second meeting, the subject being "Abraham Lincoln: President, Freethinker, Liberator." We had a larger audience than on the previous Sunday; even the lobby was occupied. The lecture seemed to interest the people. The discussion which followed lasted an hour and a half, my critics having an hour and I half an hour to answer them. There were a number present who accepted in full the fictions about Lincoln's being a believer. The most enthusiastic of these were two young men, one of whom said I had no authority for my statements but Rensburg. I answered that while there was none better than Rensburg, if he had any grudge against that author, he might consult "The True Abraham Lincoln," by William Elroy Curtis, or Lincoln's biographies by Nicolay and Hay, Herndon or Lamon. It was certainly one of the most animated discussions I ever held.

Among the many earnest workers of the League I must mention the secretary, Mr. A. B. Baden; David Eccles, whose name is familiar to TRUTH SEEKER readers; Prof. Hyland C. Kirk, one of the best informed men I ever knew, as well as Mr. Selah, Dr. Shirley and Mr. Warren. After the meeting I spent another pleasant evening at the home of Mr. Hennesy and am now in Baltimore. The incidents of my trip to this city I will relate in my next.

N. B. A short time ago a prominent Washington Rationalist died. He had made a will in which one thousand dollars was left to THE TRUTH SEEKER. This gentleman was one of the most active in our work. For some time before his death he was quite feeble, and sequestered from the world. While in this condition his wife, who was an Episcopalian, prevailed upon him to change his will. Moral: If you wish to leave something for THE TRUTH SEEKER to enable it to better carry on the work of propagating Rationalist principles, see that the paper gets it before your death. Do not let Christian relatives thwart your desire, either after your demise or when you are too near death's door to insist on your will's being put into execution.

Religious Rubbish in the Record

The Congressional Record, which should be an ideal type of publication, since it records the business transacted in the greatest and most sacred temple in the world—the Capitol at Washington—is fast sinking into the quagmire of yellow journalism and is becoming a mere mouthpiece of politics polluted by piety.

True Americans, even the religious, if they are broad-minded enough to place their country above their church, must blush with shame when they scan page after page of religious and political trash.

Our government, founded upon patriotic principles, built upon one of the grandest rationalistic documents, the Constitution of the United States, and developed along liberal lines, should not be permitted by the citizens of this nation, as it is, to be a target for all sorts of bigoted, prejudiced religious and political aims. The official organ of the law-making machine of the greatest nation in the world should be kept clean of any material offensive to the very foundation upon which this glorious liberty loving country rests.

But alas! such is not the case. Each Congressional Record bears on the first page, in the most prominent position, the daily orison of Rev. This or Rev. That. And that is not all. The latest and most impudent piece of religious rubbish, that has yet found its way into the Record is an editorial from the Richmond, Va., Evening Journal, praising the work and personality of Chaplain Couden. This editorial found a soft spot in the heart of Congressman Byrns of Tennessee, who is evidently a pure and pious patriot of the "pork" gang.

The extract from the Congressional Record containing the editorial and a specimen of the "genius of literary thought" from the pen of the Rev. Henry N. Couden, that should evoke protest and indignation from every true American citizen, are given below.

CHARLES LIEBMAN.

The Religious Rubbish Complained Of.

Mr. Byrns of Tennessee: Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a short editorial which appeared in the Evening Journal, a paper published in Richmond, Va., last Saturday, and which commends our worthy and beloved chaplain, Dr. Couden. I am quite sure it expresses the sentiment of all members of this House on both sides of the chamber, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the Record.

The Speaker: The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an editorial from the Richmond Evening Journal. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

"Blind Chaplain's Daily Oblation."

"Not the least valuable in the storehouse of treasures yielded by the Congressional Record is the daily invocation by the House Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, who for more than 20 years has served in that capacity. No visitor to the National Capital happening into the House at the opening of the daily session can fail to be impressed by the venerable figure, whose sightless eyes visualize the Almighty as readily as the man in complete possession of the seeing faculty. For many years we have followed the genius of literary thought compressed in Dr. Couden's daily prayer. Each supplication is a marvel of condensation, an epitome of man's spiritual longings, so lofty in theme, so fervent in spirit, so reflective of true devotion, that even the most pronounced skeptic in the House must be impressed and for the moment uplifted. We make no apology for reproducing on this page, so long as Congress remains in session, the blind chaplain's offerings. Wholly aside from the spiritual qualities contained, the literary construction of each is such that the prayer would adorn any editorial page in the country. We could wish that more extended publicity were given these inspiring oblations. So far as we know the Evening Journal is the only newspaper in the country making a practice of featuring the House chaplain's daily intercessions, but we hope their setting forth in the manner shown will suggest itself to other editors as not unworthy of emulation. No matter to what religious denomination a reader may belong, the devotional beauties contained in the daily prayer may be assimilated with the complete approbation of conscience. Even the agnostic, if a lover of good English, can appreciate the concrete expressions, the choice of words, the multum in parvo of these wonderful petitions to Divine Grace. Read them, if by chance you have overlooked their eurythmic charm."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 15, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D.D., offered the following prayer:

"By the marvelous disclosures Thou has made of Thyself, O God, our Father, in the vast and stupendous universe which environs us, and in its wonderful adaptation of means to ends everywhere apparent: by Thy potent influence working in and through the hearts of men; by the love poured out on the Cross of Calvary for a despairing world; by the mercy displayed in His last expiring breath, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;' by the universal faith which has come down to us out of the past; by the hopes of yon bright heaven; help us, we pray Thee, with clear vision and dauntless courage, with firm and steadfast steps to pursue the right as it is given us to see the right.

"Not enjoyment and not sorrow

Is our destined end or way;

But to act that each to-morrow

Find us farther than to-day.

"And when the tongue is eloquent no more, the soul shall speak in tears of gratitude." Amen."

What an undemonstrable, raveled scheme of conduct it all is—this conduct of prayer! Has anybody ever really believed in it, ever really based his life on it? You may remember Cromwell's famous command at Dunbar: "Pray, my hearties, but keep your powder dry!" And Moncure Conway's story of the sagacious Irish priest called to bless a particular infertile field: "Brethren, there's no use in praying here; it's manure that's wanted!" The Rationalist puts his trust frankly in powder and manure—things he can analyze, experiment with, put to the proof. He is content, nay, proud, to take the conditions of life as scientific inquiry reveals them. He will have nothing to do with magic words and potions and talismanic formulae. Nor, in his heart of hearts, will the modern anti-Rationalist. That at least is my honest conviction.—John Russell.

It is better for the world to be sensible than to be religious.

I would not destroy the Bible; I would tell the truth about it.

In a world in which God dwells there should not be a bad smell.

Don't do anything today that you will be ashamed of tomorrow.

The great trouble with people who bury the hatchet is that they leave the handle sticking out.

An old colored woman said that she named her boy "Recipe" so that when he grew up she could make something out of him.

What a man has in his pocket or in the bank is not what he is worth, but rather what he has in his head and in his heart, and what he has put into other persons' lives.

Let us have every historical fact, but get rid of the historical lies. Most of what is called history is worthless, if it is read for facts, and the real facts related are of little importance. We need life more than history; living thoughts; thoughts of freedom and democracy. If we thought more we would believe less. Make history worth reading and worth remembering. Put a thought into your life instead of a faith.

There may be somewhere a more stupid entertainment than a prayer-meeting, but I have never witnessed it. It seems to me that only hypocrites can participate in it, or persons who will never be feared for their brains. Prayers are about as good as sneezes for producing results. I would not loan money to a praying man without having the name of a man who did not pray as an endorser of his note. Religion today needs a backer.

I know a man who passes for a good Christian who is a good Freethinker, but I say nothing. Once in a while when we meet we shake hands and smile at one another. The other day was one of those once-in-a-whiles, and he said: How-dye, and I said: Ditto; then he wished me a Happy New Year, and I replied with the same wish. Now, that man is just as bad inside as I am outside, but he keeps up the game of piety while despising the whole religious outfit of the church. The woods are full of them.

I say to a Christian: You tell me there is a Holy Ghost; prove it to me. The Christian admits that his evidence is all in the Bible. Then I say to him: Do you accept everything in the Bible as true? Now he comes at me like a true Christian: "Yes," he replies, "everything in the Bible is believable religiously, but it cannot all be proved true to the satisfaction of an Infidel." So the Holy Ghost is a believable proposition, but not a scientific one—that is, the Holy Ghost does not exist only believably.

Let me ask if it is not allowing too much freedom to Roman Catholic priests to allow them to say that persons married by anyone but a priest of the Roman Catholic church are not married at all, but are living in concubinage? I see that Mr. Randall of Oklahoma calls me intolerant. I ask if there is not more than tolerance in permitting our wives to be called prostitutes, and our children bastards, by these tools of the most intolerant power on earth? It is time to call a halt on these rascals, and a halt that will bring them into a court which will compel them to answer for their insulting, lying charges. The man who can excuse a Romish priest for his attitude towards our public schools is not a Freethinker nor a citizen of this republic that the republic can be proud of. L. K. W.

Almost every person, if you will believe himself, holds a quite different theory of life from the one on which he is patently acting.—Stevenson.

Christianity's Success.

The thesis of Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, that Christianity is ineffective and that its failure is proved by the warring Christian nations of Europe, has moved Cardinal Gibbons to make a reply. The attention of the prelate having been drawn to the question, he remarked that when a man of Dr. Eliot's prominence asked, "Is Christianity a failure?" it was "incumbent upon the church to accept the gauntlet thus thrown down and to bring to bear against her antagonists her strongest controversial weapons." The cardinal assumes that Christianity and the Catholic church are identical.

The statement by Dr. Eliot that excites the cardinal to belligerency is the following:

"For nineteen hundred years the ethics of Jesus of Nazareth have been in the world, but have had no effect to prevent or even reduce the evils of war, the greatest of the evils which afflict mankind. The ethical doctrines of Christianity in regard to justice, humility and mercy have not found expression in the relations between Christian nations, whether in peace or war, or indeed in the history of institutional Christianity itself."

When we originally read this utterance of the eminent Dr. Eliot we received the impression that he had got the believers in Jesus as the Prince of Peace pretty tightly sewed up; but the cardinal does not contemplate Jesus in that aspect. On the contrary, the Jesus of the Catholic church is a war prophet. Says Dr. Gibbons:

"How dare Dr. Eliot imply that the Christ ever said anything against war? Surely, they have heard at Harvard the prophecy, 'There shall be wars and rumors of wars.' Dr. Eliot must know that the Christ said that he came to earth to bring not peace, but a sword. I deny that there is anything in the authenticated teachings of Jesus of Nazareth that would place him among those whom we know to-day as pacifists. On the contrary, he repeatedly recognized the moral value of strife and conflict among men, and implied in all his teachings that warfare, the eternal struggle between good and evil, is inherent in the nature of the universe. 'Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's.' In these words the Christ makes a distinction that comes logically from the lips of him who came to bring not an olive-branch but a sword to earth."

Accordingly, if we accept Jesus we must accept war. We are to understand that he foresaw the future when he made the prediction that "there shall be wars and rumors of war," and that the outlook was agreeable to his philosophy.

We might note that the warlike manifestations spoken of were predicated of a time immediately preceding the second coming of Christ, and that the reputation of Jesus as a prophet depends on a fulfillment; but the quoters of prophecy habitually ignore all circumstance and context and conveniently forget all inharmonious texts.

Opposed to the notion that Jesus believed in war is his statement that were his kingdom of this world, then would his children fight. His children disregard that, and fight whether or no. The cardinal dismisses Dr. Eliot in these words:

"And until Dr. Eliot can bring proof to show that the Christ based the success of his mission upon earth upon the elimination of war from man's activities, his recent utterances will remain unworthy of his exalted position as a thinker and publicist."

This is presumed to be final. Dr. Eliot challenged Christianity. The gauntlet was accepted by Cardinal Gibbons, and by him "the strongest controversial weapons" of the church are brought "to bear against her antagonists." These weapons prove to be the words attributed to Jesus: "There shall be wars and rumors of wars," and "I came not to bring peace but a sword."

"Taking that view of it, Dr. Eliot was wrong, and Christianity is not a failure but a success. It has accomplished its mission. At the end of nineteen hundred years its bloody record has been crowned with a war, hitherto inconceivable in extent and atrocity.

If by the success of Christianity, however, was meant peace, justice, brotherhood and all that goes to make up what Freethinkers would call civilization, then of course Christianity has failed. But, take Cardinal Gibbons's word for it, that is the "wrong dope." Jesus came to prophesy war and to bring the sword wherewith to carry it on. The peace associated with his doctrine is that of the graveyard, or that "rest" which nations agree to take when they are all in and can fight no longer without recuperating their energies and grinding their weapons.

Whether Christianity has proved a success or a failure depends upon the meaning attached to those words, and they are differently defined according to the standards of Dr. Eliot, who wants a religion of peace, and Cardinal Gibbons, who sees nothing unchristian in war. The lesson is that controvertists should define their terms. Dr. Eliot's error arises from his misconception of Christianity, which, corrected by the Baltimore prelate, shows that religion and war are mates subsisting harmoniously.

Liberty and Thomas Paine.

Every man, and every woman too, should speak as he thinks, whether his thoughts are like the thoughts of other men or not. I should emphasize the not. If I am to say what somebody else has said, then there is no sense in my saying anything. Persons are not alike. They do not look alike, dress alike, nor live alike. Difference is the charm of life. The only decent excuse a man can make for living is that he is unlike everybody else. I do not care whether I agree with the living or the dead. I am concerned only that I speak my honest thoughts, and, if any man tries to take away my right to free speech, that man is not only my enemy, but he is the enemy of every human being on the globe.

The future destiny of liberty in the United States depends more upon study of the works of Thomas Paine than upon study of the Bible, for this nation without liberty would be only a province of Rome. Our highest duty as free men and women is not to sow any more seeds of religion, but rather to pull up the ecclesiastical weeds which have grown on this continent from such seeds in our soil. There is no greatness which cannot come with liberty; there is none which can come without it. Man must use the wings of his mind to fly to loftier crags and peaks of thought. Do you know that a thought is the greatest thing in the world—greater than the sun and stars of the heavens? Without one particular thought our nation would still be just a clump of British colonies, dead to all the noblest ideals of government, dead to all the highest mental attainments of man.

Who planted that one particular thought in the fields and forests of those colonies, which changed the wilderness of monarchy to the civilization of a republic? Thomas Paine. Our children and our children's children should be taught to sing the glory of this man's name—a glory which outshines the painted splendor of all the saints in the church's calendar.

One of the brightest minds of our country has paid his tribute of love and gratitude to the matchless genius of Thomas Paine, but even the glowing words of our great Ingersoll have left unsaid a higher praise, a grander eulogy, of the conquering power of that wonderful man.

When Paine came to America there was somewhere within him the thought of a new world, of a nation built upon the freedom of man. It was this thought which Paine planted on our continent. The seed sprouted and the tree grew, but the curse of the old world came to our shores, came here to do what it had done for long years in other nations—to kill the freedom of man and to bind him in ecclesiastical slavery. Paine's words have not been heeded, or our country would not now be the prey of priests. It may be too late to raise the warning cry of danger and say to our republic "Beware!" But, if liberty is to be saved in this land, men and women must be awakened and aroused to their duty.

To regain physical health, the doctors say: "Back to the soil." To regain health and happiness which comes with freedom, I say: "Back to Thomas Paine!"

I have a suggestion to make to this nation—that instead of having the obscene old Christian Bible read in our public schools, we have the works of Paine read there by the pupils. If there is one thing that the young people of this country need to learn, it is the value of liberty, the political heart and soul of this republic. Paine's works are rich with the blossoms and the fruit of freedom, and no man has left to the world a greater legacy than the gift of his splendid genius.

Thomas Paine was the apostle of liberty, greater than the twelve apostles of Jesus, greater even than all the apostles and all the prophets of all the religions of the world.

Liberty does not grow on the tree of faith, and all that comes to man from believing is infinitesimal in its benefit to man compared with what comes to humanity from the glorious political and mental freedom won by the heroes and martyrs of the buried centuries.

MARILLA M. RICKER.

Mischievous Meddling.

A letter that James F. Morton, Jr., has addressed to Secretary of State Lansing was prompted by the following statement in the New York Times:

"In response to his appeal for protection for two Mexican churchmen arrested by Carranza in Mexico and feared to be in danger of execution for alleged conspiracy, Bishop Thomas F. Cusack yesterday received assurances of all possible aid from Secretary of State Lansing. Senator James O'Gorman and Representative Charles B. Ward, and these will be followed this morning by a telegram to the State Department from Representative Rollin B. Sanford, now at home in Albany, asking the department to act with all possible haste as it thinks best in aid of the prelates.

"The wire from Secretary Lansing said: 'The State Department representatives in Mexico has been instructed to use every possible good office in the interests of the churchmen mentioned in your telegram of Sunday, addressed to Secretary Tumulty.'

"Senator O'Gorman replied to Bishop Cusack: 'Your esteemed telegram of Monday in reference to the archbishop of Guadalajara and the bishop of Zacatecas has been brought to the attention of the State Department and the department has wired our representatives to intercede for these prelates. As soon as there is any information regarding the case I shall be glad to communicate with you further.'

Representative Ward's message was: 'Your telegram received and I will be glad to co-operate in the matter with the other members of Congress who represent the fifteen counties comprising your diocese.'

The United States government has gone into the business of protecting Mexican ecclesiastics from the consequences of conspiring, as political priests, against the Carranza government. Following is Mr. Morton's letter to Secretary Lansing:

"Dear Sir: I have read with amazed incredulity the statement in the usually accurate New York Times that the state department of the United States has, at the instance of certain Roman Catholic hierarchs, assumed to make special intercession with the provisional government of Mexico in behalf of two Mexican subjects accused of treasonable conspiracy, merely because these particular individuals are officials in the Roman Catholic Church of Mexico. I am not a bigoted anti-Catholic, but simply a profound believer in Americanism, which involves obedience to the spirit as well as to the letter of the constitutional prohibition of the establishment of religion by our government, and the absolute and permanent separation of church and state. These two Mexican subjects are no more wards of the United States than any other subjects of Mexico. They are accused of a crime; and our government has no right to assume that they will not receive as fair a trial as any of their fellow-subjects accused of the same crime. That is, of course, all to which they are entitled; and unless it is to be our policy to make a similar appeal on behalf of every Mexican accused of treason or conspiracy, on the ground that we are prepared to take the official position that the provisional government of Mexico is incompetent to try its own subjects for alleged offenses, and that it is our invariable duty to intervene on behalf of a common humanity, there can be no justification for our intermeddling. To leave all other Mexican subjects to their fate, and to select these two members of the Romanist hierarchy for special intercession, violates our own principles of religious liberty and equality.

"It is true that the late pope dishonored himself and his religion by issuing an infamous document which threatened with excommunication any Catholic who should be loyal to his country and should perform the plain duty of any decent citizen in the interest of public justice, by citing a priest into court under the same conditions as any other person; but I had not dreamed that the government of the United States would trample on its own principles of democracy by accepting even in a measure so outrageous a doctrine. The late priest Hans Schmidt of New York, who murdered his paramour, was tried, convicted and executed like any other murderer; and neither Mexico nor any other government was guilty of the impropriety of interceding to beg for favoritism because of the clerical standing of the criminal.

"If the medieval monstrosity of 'benefit of clergy' is to be revived at the impudent demand of a hierarchy in this country, it is high time to counter with a return to the defensive weapon found necessary in England under similar conditions, and to bring the writ of praemunire once more into use."

In 1915 the Catholic church appealed to the state department in behalf of nuns and priests who, it was asserted, were being abused by the Zapatistas and Villistas; and the department, through the President's Catholic private secretary, Joseph Tumulty, replied that no cases like those complained of were known to the department. The priests in their sermons are still using Secretary Tumulty as an example of a bad Catholic, second only to Mayor Mitchel of New York in that respect.

The Mexican bishops have been ready to oppose any government Mexico has had since the beginning of the attempt at a constitutional government in 1911 except the bloody one of Huerta, and having once opposed Villa they are now with him as against Carranza. These two ecclesiastics, Archbishop Jimenez and Bishop de la Mora, were in this country a while ago, having come here to get away from Villa. Now that Villa is fighting the government, they have returned to Mexico as his allies.

Complaint has been made that our government does not guarantee protection to its own citizens in Mexico, but it becomes active when a Catholic priest is menaced, although the priest is not a citizen of this country but of Mexico.

No question of religious persecution enters into this case; it is a state question, the priests having carried on an agitation against the government in time of war, which they would not be allowed to do in Germany, France or England, and if they were to attempt it the intervention of the United States in their behalf would be resented by those countries as an unfriendly act.

Mr. Morton's letter puts the affair in its true light. It has been sent to Senator O'Gorman and Representative Ward, and we shall be surprised if either they or Secretary Lansing attempt a defense of their unwarranted interference with the civil affairs of a sister republic.

The Influence of Science Upon the Authorities of Religion.

Modern science is not only a glorious thing in itself by virtue of the wonderful discoveries it has made, but it is great also because of the influence it has had upon the authorities of religion, compelling them to justify themselves, and enduing them with effectiveness only when they have passed its searching tests.

Take for instance the Bible. Invested with the adventitious power of a supposed inerrancy, regarded as the actual utterance of God from beginning to end, a word which settled every point of truth, the Bible was necessarily the enemy of science. If the Bible spoke of the sun going down and rising, it was heresy to say that the earth revolved and went round the sun. If the Bible said that the heavens were spread over the earth as a curtain, it was blasphemy to speak of the interstellar spaces which, with their sparkling and crowded solar systems, form the apparent arch of heaven for inhabitants of the earth. If the Bible said that the whole earth, sun, moon and stars were made in 144 hours, it was impious to read the record of the rocks, and to recognize the slow work of countless millenniums in the organic forms and the physical transformation of the globe. The Bible, thus understood, was the enemy of science, opposed a bar to the progress of knowledge, condemned the seeker after truth as a heretic.

The biblical authority was none the less disastrous in the sphere of morals. Everything contained within its cover, a word of God intact and complete, claimed a moral authority and finality. Cromwell cracked the skulls of the defenders of Drogheda on the strength of a military regulation, a word of God, in Deuteronomy. Pious men roused Protestantism to the carnage and cruelty of the Thirty Years' War by an appeal to the blood-thirsty Psalms. That most dismal of superstitions, the belief in witchcraft, was supported for centuries by the authority of the Bible. Many feeble and deranged women have been drowned or burnt because in the Mosaic Law of two thousand years ago it was said: "Suffer not a witch to live." For was not this the word of God?

Hideous superstitions and cruelties have been perpetrated on the authority of the New Testament. Because an epistle says that a believer is not to eat with an heretical teacher, Calvin spurred the Church-commonwealth of Geneva to burn Servetus. Because in a parable Christ says: "Compel them to come in," Torquemada racked and burned ten thousand heretics in Spain, and the Duke of Alva was sent to exterminate a nation, with the papal benediction. On an ambiguous text in Matthew xvi is reared the stupendous despotism of the papacy. On a blind literalism in taking the words of the institution of what has been called the Lord's Supper, rests that monument of human perversity, the dogma of transubstantiation. The Bible, therefore, as heretofore interpreted, has been used to enforce error, cruelty and spiritual tyranny.

Now the scientific spirit, like a cleansing fire, is sweeping through the Bible, with the most salutary results. It has shown that the Bible is pre-scientific, and, therefore, whatever may be its value, it can never be set up against any scientific conclusion. Science, which unfolds the facts of nature, and the verifiable development and laws of things, must correct the Bible, which is a partial evidence only of the evolution of religion. The same spirit has completely altered the perspective in the moral teaching of the Bible. Here evolution has made it necessary to see a progress in moral ideas. No moral precept for a nomadic people two thousand, or three thousand, years ago can possibly, as such, be binding on the peoples of today. Moral precepts are relative to the environment. They are shaped by the social institutions and standards of the time. The stream of moral ideas purifies itself as it runs. Its authority comes from utility and experience, dictated by the growth of the spirit of advancement in the body of humanity. It is thus that science, among its other splendid achievements, has made the Bible more acceptable even to the believer himself by appraising it at its true valuation. The believer is now recognizing this fact, and as a consequence the influence of scientific ideas is being greatly extended, and her claims to preeminence over the spirit of superstition wonderfully strengthened.

To know what you prefer, instead of humbly saying Amen to what the world tells you you ought to prefer, is to have kept your soul alive—Stevenson.

THE BRIEF FOR FREE SPEECH.

The Animus of Justice Kent in the Ruggles Case—His Clerical Antecedents.

BY THEODORE SCHROEDER.

Concurrent with the growing dissensions between the Colonists and the representatives of the Crown, there came into being John Peter Zenger's New York Weekly Journal. Zenger was soon arrested for seditious libel. A stormy contest ensued, during which Zenger's two attorneys were disbarred, and he found it necessary to bring Andrew Hamilton from Philadelphia to conduct his defense. The judges used all those methods known in modern police-court slang as "railroading" to bring about a conviction, but the jury acquitted. This trial, in 1635, "was far-reaching in its consequences, and was of such importance that it is doubtful if any case in America had a more interested and attentive audience." . . . The event has been called "the Morning Star of that Liberty which subsequently revolutionized America." (XIII Nat. Ency. of Amer. Biography, 298-9). From such events come the clarification of people's thinking about the meaning of free speech. The court had instructed the jury to find only on the fact of publication, which had been admitted, leaving it to the court to determine the character of the paper. The argument of Hamilton was a frank appeal to the jury to disregard the instruction of the judge and find upon their own knowledge such questions as criminal intent and the truth of the publication, which they did. (Several editions of this trial have been published. It is also reported in 17 Howell's State Trials, p. 675-764.)

Soon after the organization of the state government, and the divided court in People v. Cromwell (3 John. 393), a bill was passed affecting libels. The preamble read: "Whereas, doubt exists whether on a trial of an indictment or information for a libel, the jury have a right to give their verdict on the whole matter in issue," therefore it was enacted that the jury had such right, and the truth, good motives, and justifiable ends should be a defense. It also prohibited the prosecution of libel on information. All this was manifestly the legislative confirmation of the issues contended for in the Zenger case, which were designed to promote freedom of the press. The Zenger case almost found a reversal in the famous Cromwell case (3 John. Cases, 337; 1805), and in the New York Constitutional Convention of 1821, the principle of both was firmly fixed, for the further enlargement of intellectual liberty.

Between 1743 and 1745 a bill was introduced, requiring persons in the Colony to take the Test Oaths, appointed by Parliament for the security of Government and Protestantism. The bill passed the Assembly by a vote of 14 to 7. In the meantime, the war between England and France was progressing. Manifestly, fear of Catholic France or a pressure from England, and a desire for the greater liberty of Protestantism, were the inspiring motives for this anti-Catholic legislation.

A review of this Colonial record exhibits the same conflict of ideals as to the limits of toleration as that which is found elsewhere. Those who stood for tyranny usually stood for the repression of heretical opinions about human institutions, whether in their religious or political aspects. These persons fell back on the reasonings of the English courts about seditious libels, whether concerned with religious or political doctrines. The legislative and judicial tests of criminality both in England and in most American Colonies where the common law prevailed, were dependent upon a problematical and speculative theory about a prospective psychologic tendency of the incriminated utterance to produce a constructive or real breach of the peace through some hypothetical future hearer or reader.

The friends of freedom always complained of this because of the certainty that tyranny would result from such unreal and uncertain tests for determining the limits of intellectual liberty. Hence, the opponents of the official theory of censorship always tend toward an insistence that the criteria of guilt shall be an actually ascertained and resultant material injury, or real disturbance, consequent upon the indicted utterance. This tendency is portrayed in all discussion for the promotion of more freedom of speech, and shows itself in the utterances of the Colonists of New York, just as it did in Rhode Island and England. As the opposition to the English judicial conception grew in clarity of understanding, the issues became more definite. These issues as to the growth of religious liberty were decided by the Constitutions. The growth through tolerance to liberty, consisted in a progressive elimination of the unveiled psychologic tendency as a test of criminality.

The New York constitution of 1777 begins with a recital of grievances, which, among many, includes these. "He [the king] refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary to the public good. . . . For depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury." Here there comes to mind the declaration of rights which the king had annulled, and from which was quoted above the provision for mutual toleration among Christian sects, up to the point of actual disturbance of the peace. We also see the influence of the trial of Zenger, and Judge Delancy's effort to deprive the jury of the right to declare upon the whole issue.

The New York constitution of 1777, in Article 7, provides that Quakers shall be allowed to declare their allegiance to the government by affirmation instead of by oath. The common law and colonial statutes in force April 19, 1775, are continued in force; but it is provided "that all such parts of the said common law, and all such of the said statutes and acts aforesaid, or parts thereof, as may be construed to establish or maintain any particular denomination of Christians or their ministers, or concern the allegiance heretofore yielded to [the English sovereign, etc.] . . . or are repugnant to this constitution, be and hereby are abrogated and rejected." The real question in the Ruggles case was whether or not the common law crime of blasphemy was repugnant to the constitution, interpreted, of course, in the light of these past controversies of which its provisions for the separation of church and state were a culmination. These provisions which supplement the foregoing act of disestablishment will now be discussed.

Section 38 (N. Y. Constitution, 1777): "Whereas, we are required by the benevolent principles of rational liberty, not only to expel civil tyranny but also to guard against that spiritual oppression and intolerance wherewith the bigotry and ambition of weak and wicked priests and princes have scourged mankind: This Convention doth further, and in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, ordain, determine and declare that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this state to all mankind; provided that the liberty of conscience hereby granted shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of the State."

Section 39 provides: "And whereas the ministers of the gospel are by their profession dedicated to the service of God and the cure of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their function; therefore, no minister of the gospel, or priest of any denomination whatsoever, shall at any time hereafter under any pretense or description whatever be eligible to or capable of holding any civil or military office or place within this state."

The proviso in Section 38 against licentiousness must be interpreted in the light of the past colonial controversies as to the limit of tolerance. Thus construed, in connection with the declaration or rights above quoted, there can be no doubt that "licentiousness" meant actual, and not merely a constructive, licentiousness. The line had been plainly drawn by the Colonial General Assembly. To make their meaning plain beyond reasonable chance for controversy they express it in the alternative, thus: "to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace [actual peace] and safety [actual safety] of the state."

That my interpolations express the true purpose and spirit of those who adopted this provision is plain, not only from the prior colonial declarations, but also from the disestablishment of the church, which removed the reason for blasphemy laws, as a part of constructive treasons, and especially from the preamble, which again draws the lines between civil tyranny and actual peace on the one hand, and between spiritual oppression and tolerance on the other, with their attendant tendency, speculatively to produce civil disturbance. If Justice Kent had looked his problem squarely in the face, with a dominant desire to meet every issue fairly he would have answered this question: How can I "guard against that spiritual oppression and intolerance" sought to be abrogated by the constitution, and yet maintain a blasphemy law?

The Ruggles Decision Again.

It was charged in the Ruggles case that the defendant did "wickedly, maliciously and blasphemously utter," etc. The question was whether or not the common law crime of blasphemy had been abrogated by the constitutional provisions above quoted. It is noteworthy that the New York constitution of that time did not yet expressly guarantee, in any form, freedom of speech and press.

A careful reading of Justice Kent's decision in the Ruggles case suggests that, when not engaged in the mere dogmatic assertion of his ultimate conclusion, his acute intellect is devoted to reading a meaning into the constitution, not to an endeavor to read a meaning out of it. Through the entire length of his opinion the argument is obviously directed to justify what he thought the constitution ought to be, rather than to discovering the opinion upon that subject entertained by those who framed that constitution, and the people who adopted it. In other words, under the influence of his Christian zeal, Mr. Justice Kent neglected the distinction between construction and interpolation. We shall presently see that his Christian zeal was coupled with a strong aversion to that conception of religious liberty in which Roger Williams and Thomas Jefferson believed, and which our constitutions adopted.

Mr. Justice Kent is equally careless in his intellectual processes, when he holds that the common law crime of blasphemy may be enforced under the saving clause against "acts of licentiousness or [to] justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of the state." His conception of "licentiousness" was that of the English courts, after the repeal of the licensing laws and when therefore the word had lost its former certain meaning of being "unlicensed." Now English courts began to punish men for constructive breaches of the peace, justifying themselves by theories about the problematical and speculative psychologic tendencies of an idea to influence some hypothetical hearer or reader of the future. By their Declaration of Rights in 1691 the Colonists of New York had already made it plain that they repudiated Justice Kent's conception of constructive "licentiousness" and constructive breaches of "peace and safety of the state." Both by that, and by the Charter of August 27, 1683, with royal approval, they had enjoyed freedom "for any difference in opinion or matter of religious concernment" for all those "who do not actually disturb civil peace . . . nor to the civil injury or outward disturbance of others."

In view of the strong constitutional language against "the bigotry and ambition of weak and wicked priests" and the disabilities declared against all priests and ministers, it is simply preposterous to say that by this constitution it was intended to perpetuate the common law as to blasphemy, which, insofar as penalization was justified by speculations upon psychologic "tendency," they, in their charter and Declaration of Rights, had long ago repudiated. Justice Kent evidently had difficulty in seeing the bearings of those constitutional provisions, which reflected so strongly on the clergy, because that class included his revered grandfather!

Like himself, his father and grandfather had been educated at Yale University, in a colony which was ruled by a spiritual aristocracy, because none could hold office without church membership; and a property aristocracy, where none could vote without taxpaying qualification; and a church-state, in which the spiritual aristocrats were supported by the taxing power exercised by the political aristocrats. Reared and educated under such influences, it was quite natural that he should have an emotional aversion to those provisions of the New York constitution which cast odium upon the system of his human idols, by reference to the "spiritual oppression and intolerance wherewith the bigotry and ambition of wicked priests and princes have scourged mankind." Ruggles, the blasphemer before the court, was one of the party for whose benefit the constitution had inveighed against his clerical ancestor, and declared him, and all like him, to be ineligible for public office. The professional psychanalyst knows best how to value the potency of that paternal influence upon the aristocratic feelings of Justice Kent. The psychanalyst understands perfectly how these feeling-attitudes precluded Justice Kent from seeing the hated constitutional provisions as being important factors in the interpretation of that other provision which he was impelled to explain away. Through Ruggles, Justice Kent got even with those who had done violence to his spiritual aristocracy.

The influence of his aristocratic ancestors was still at work upon Justice Kent while in the constitutional convention of 1821. In addition to his opposition to the free speech amendment we find him "opposing without success the extension of the electoral franchise and other democratic innovations." (Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography, vol. iii, p. 521.)

When all the related facts are taken into account which Justice Kent ignored, then intellectual self-respect will preclude our acceptance of his opinion in People v. Ruggles as an authority upon the meaning of a separation of church and state and its associated intellectual freedom. [Continued.]

The God Idea.

Without a belief in God, which it appears that the men of science are largely discarding, no man would have a religion or want one. It is the God idea rattling around in his skull that makes him desire to pray and worship, for those two things are the basis of every religion that exists. What a fool thing it is to pray and worship, when the object of such senseless acts is a phantom of the skies, that was never seen and never will be seen save by the use of the imagination. Religion is the most idiotic thing to which man ever turned his attention, or by which his life was influenced. His supreme faculty, reason, is shunned and neglected to run after religious nonsense; to seek and to serve a God that his fears and his ignorance have created through mental action alone; for no trace of any God exists in the universe or was ever found; and that fact explains why no two persons can agree on what he is; and no man living can define him so as to convey any sense or meaning to the mind. God is an incomprehensible something to all who try to believe in one; and as ages of time have failed to produce any results in the everlasting search for him or to show that Nature needs a God to account for her movements or to explain them, it is pretty near time to cut loose from such a waste of time and effort.

If the existence of this old and venerated delusion cannot by facts and scientific discoveries be established, how and in what way is humanity benefited by holding onto it, and keeping up the folly of building expensive churches and cathedrals, in which to practice ceremonials that would reflect no credit on a monkey? If there were a God, he would be beneath the contempt of human intelligence in a pure state, if he demanded or would receive the senseless forms of praise and worship that are given to him throughout the Christian world, let alone those of other religions not much better. No man with ordinary horse-sense would feel flattered or complimented by receiving, if set apart from all other men for that purpose, the homage and worship in connection with fool ceremonies that are bestowed upon God. Religious rites and spectacular shows are the height of tomfoolery, and the extreme limit of utter folly. There is nothing viewed by the light of reason that puts a man lower in the scale of human intelligence than the practice of religious forms and ceremonies intended to please and placate a God great enough to create and control the universe, as all God believers credit him with doing.

Think of burning incense, worse than tobacco smoke to most women, to give pleasure to God almighty, ruler of heaven and earth and general manager of hell. Why, the transparent absurdity ought to make a man snicker who is destitute of a sense of humor. And when we think of a man getting down on his knees, shutting his eyes, and putting up before his face his two closed hands, before he can pray to God in desired meekness and an acceptable manner, the ludicrousness of the situation is greatly increased. A monkey would laugh if he could understand what the man is doing.

What is there in all Nature that leads a human being thus to degrade himself—to imagine for one instant that such an act does or could redound to his benefit in any way? There is nothing; and no man ever did such a thing until he had sacrificed his reason to superstition. The use of reason at all times and under all circumstances is the only thing that will prevent human beings from making fools of themselves, or being fooled by a class of men who use religion and the God idea for that purpose.

When any man, because he dresses like an old woman, can make other men think he has power they do not possess, to reach and influence God, and that their fate after death is in his hands unless they obey him and keep him well supplied with money that not only makes the mare go but insures leisure and luxuries for the priest, he surely has a soft snap. What is there about men in this age of the world, when the light of knowledge is so generally diffused, and Nature is now an open book in many respects, from which all can read because of scientific discoveries and the revealments of philosophy, that keeps them in slavery and subjection to priestcraft?

It is easy to understand how the mind of man was chained to superstition in those ages when reading and writing were monopolized by the priesthood and a select few of the upper ten; when the art of printing was unknown, and nothing not permitted by the priest could reach the intellect of the masses; but in these days of open avenues to every department of thought and science, how can those fakirs continue to hold their victims and perpetuate the old, old graft, that has drawn money in unlimited quantities from the pockets of the toiling millions, ever since such a thing was known? It is hard to see; but this we can see and do know: until the God idea is exterminated from every human mind, superstition will never meet with extinction, for the two are inseparable.

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

Religion and the Utopias.

You can put them both together—Plato, with his ideal commonwealth and Thomas More with his Utopia; one a pagan; the other a devout churchman. And this is the conclusion: that religion cannot do it; that religion cannot be depended upon for the regeneration of society. It has been tried. I don't say that the morality of Jesus or the plan of Jesus has been tried; I say religion has been tried. I think Jesus has been left out of the reckoning as much as Plato has. When I read that he said that the poor are blessed and the meek are to inherit the earth and that you should call no man "Master" and that if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven good and plenty, just to sell all your goods and give to the poor and "come and follow me"—when I read things like that, and then think that the richest institution in the world is a Christian institution, that the richest men in the world are professing Christians, Sunday school teachers, builders of churches, endowers of universities—when I read what Jesus said and see the things I see, I am persuaded that Jesus' plan has never even been tried in the world.

Why can't the church do it? Because the church, by its very self-interest, has always opposed, and must always oppose every step forward. The church is a beneficiary of things as they exist today; just or unjust, right or wrong, the church is a beneficiary. If there is an injustice, an inequity, a legal immorality, an oppression justified by custom and convention, the church has a share in the profits of that injustice. And so the dear, delightful, simple-minded, shallow-headed, gullible people, when a man of vast wealth comes along and builds a million dollar church or endows a hospital—they simply fall on their faces and say, "Here is a man of God! God bless him!" What is our law—the law of our state, the law of our civilization, the law of the whole Christian world? It is this: That whatever pays is right, if you can get by with it. Justice, equity and right? Why, those are trivial considerations—don't trouble us with them. And if there is no way to get by with a doubtful thing, get a law! Get a legislature! Get a judge or two! Get a court! Get a jury! But get something—there must be some way!

I have in mind a manufacturer. His factory is in a town where there is a state penal institution. He had been employing all the inmates and wishing there were more, in the making of his product. And they began to agitate the abolition of the contract system. He foresaw that such a law would be passed. So he got to the legislature—he beat them to it; and he got a bill through by which he contracted to pay each one of the inmates of the institution the sum of fifteen cents a day for a period of five years. I don't know just the form of the legislation; but that is the substance of it. Then they passed a law abolishing the contract labor; but he was ahead of them: he had a contract that ran in spite of the law for five years. This man is an ardent churchman, an extreme prohibitionist; he is a loyal supporter of foreign missionaries; he is a Sunday school worker; he is all that a man needs to be to wear every kind of cloak and covering to hide a wicked and sordid heart. Then the state legislature passed a law that they could not sell prison-made furniture or harnesses or goods of any kind. That is easy, too—for good Christians to evade that. So this acquaintance of mine built a great factory in that same town—another factory. He has his goods manufactured in the prison, just the same, up to a certain point. They would put on everything—if they were building a table, they would put on everything but that border, or leave off some part; and then they would send the thing down to the factory to be assembled. And then it was marked, made in the factory. As a matter of fact, it had been made in the penal institution and is being made there yet and is being assembled in the outside there yet, against the law—what about the law? That is nothing. Against the principle of right and decency and honesty!

Now, the church has the man and the man has the church. The church has his soul saved—the man has his ticket in his pocket; he can look Saint Peter in the face and tell him to get out of the way—he wants to get into the company where he belongs. He can do all of that; and so can any Christian do it.

There is another reason why the church cannot do it: because the church is a selfish thing. Men go there to save their souls, to escape God's wrath. Well, when an institution has got nothing else to do in this wide, wicked, suffering world but save the souls of a few people for some world that we know not of—when an institution has nothing else to do but that, it is more than a hindrance in the way of human progress. The church is a dissipation. When you and I have been there, if we are good church people, and have sung a little and prayed a little and have listened to some good loud, mouth-filling, rip-roaring prayers, we just feel all halleluiahs, all up and down. Why, we have been on the Mount of Transfiguration. "It is mighty good for us to have been here!" And then we go out with lassitude, and our moral energy is gone. We have been serving God, and we owe humanity nothing. I say to you that it is useless and futile and selfish sentimentalism to serve God; but to serve men is the high, the holy thing!

JOHN EMERSON ROBERTS.

The Injured Innocents.

Once upon a time, in a country not laid down upon the maps, an absolute monarch determined to make an interesting experiment.

To this end, he placed his two infant children in a luxuriously appointed nursery, with every plaything which their little hearts could desire, and directed that they should be daily fed on the most dainty delicacies that money could buy.

Only one thing was forbidden them, and that thing was a beautifully bound volume, placed within easy reach of their tiny hands. This volume they were never to open, under any circumstances, on pain of their royal parent's grave displeasure, albeit they were made aware that it contained many beautiful illuminated pictures, such as they would never be able to find elsewhere.

The two children naturally felt great curiosity as to the contents of the mysterious picture book, but they gratefully refrained from opening it, feeling that they owed that duty, at least, to the parent who had brought them into the world and bestowed so many blessings upon them.

At length, one day, a trusted nurse told them that their father had not really meant to forbid them to open the book, and that he would reward, instead of punishing them, for doing so; but that, in a spirit of jest, he had sought to find out how long they would obey his arbitrary command.

Delighted with this intelligence, they made haste to feast their eyes upon the contents of the mysterious volume, which they found to be more fascinating than anything they had ever before seen. They were thus delightfully engrossed when they heard their royal father exclaim in a voice of thunder: and, looking up, they saw him glaring at them with such fury that they were almost paralyzed with terror.

"What means this disobedience?" he demanded.

"Nurse told us that you wanted us to open it!" they replied together; but their innocent answer failed to assuage the fury of their unreasonable parent, who at once took them away from the beautiful nursery, cast them into a dungeon, tortured them with the worst bodily torments, and ultimately put them both to cruel deaths.

"What a ferocious wretch!" we naturally exclaim; but the "orthodox" Christian worships that very monarch as a God.

The monarch was the Old Testament Jehovah; the nursery was the Garden of Eden; the children were Adam and Eve; the forbidden book was the tree of knowledge, and the treacherous nurse was the serpent who tempted Eve.

The cruel tortures are the diseases inflicted upon Adam, Eve, and all mankind as a punishment for a mere schoolboy offense; and the cruel death is but a faint symbol to depict the awful terrors of the "orthodox" hell.

If anything, the monarch of this tale is the milder specimen, for he punished only two victims, while the "orthodox" God punishes untold millions; and the sufferings of the children ended with death, while the punishment of the human race is said to extend through all eternity.

Let us be thankful for our freedom from such superstitions.

FREDERICK W. TAYLOR.

In all the affairs of human life, social as well as political, I have remarked that courtesies of a small and trivial character are the ones that strike deepest to the grateful and appreciating heart.—Henry Clay.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The German emperor celebrated recently his birthday anniversary. One of the distinguished features of the occasion was a public religious service at which the court chaplain delivered a remarkable sermon. The characteristic theme of the discourse was the assurance felt by the German people that God was wholly on their side, and would lead them to ultimate victory. "In all cases of the past," said the preacher, "God has helped us, and God will fight for us today, through our leaders and our soldiers." More than two years ago a German professor writing in the Lokalanzeiger, a prominent German publication, explained the religious position in his country in these words: "The deepest and most thought-inspiring result of the war is the German God. Not the national God, such as the lower nations worship, but 'our God,' who is not ashamed of belonging to us, the peculiar acquirement of our heart." The natural conclusion from these and other statements made by the learned leaders of present-day German thought is that the German nation, anxious to achieve a unique position among the nations of the earth, has decided to select its own God, in whom all other peoples of the earth shall have no share. This was the custom in olden times, and there appears to be no reason why such a selection should not be made by any individual nation today. The only point that concerns us is the fact—made evident by this Teutonic conception of deity—that here is an illustration of men making their own God. Even if it be allowed that the German God bears some relation to the universal deity, it is plain that the German idea of that deity is very different from that which obtains in all other European countries—sufficiently different to make the German God a local, national divinity. This is why the Germans speak of every new victory won by German arms as "a testimony from the Lord on high"; or, as the court chaplain said: "God cannot—he will not—permit the German people to go down." Who said that men do not make their own gods? The clever saying of a modern writer—also a German—was more than a witticism when he exclaimed: "Man made God in his own image." This has long been a fact of history, and is now fast becoming a truth of the intellect.

We are again asked to contemplate the place of economics in a Freethought paper. When there are in the United States probably fifty, possibly one hundred, newspapers whose editors and contributors make a specialty of telling us how government, society and production and distribution of farm and factory products should be revised, cannot the most earnest of them be reconciled to one paper that devotes itself to expounding the principles of Freethought, to the exclusion, except, in a department, of social, economic, financial and kindred questions? We admit that all reforms are one. So far as we know we were the first to recognize this relationship or identity and to write an article under the head of "The Oneness of Reforms" that showed idealists they could not afford to knock one another or depreciate other reforms than their own. We do not suppose that we could print in THE TRUTH SEEKER an attack on anything between Emma Goldman's Anarchism and Bouck White's Socialism, or anything from Spiritualism to Positivism, or from birth control to suicide, without drawing the fire of some reader; nor could the adherents of those things assail Freethinkers with impunity. That is what we set forth years ago, and circumstances have attested its truth, which we still maintain. That is why we get impatient sometimes when from one and another have come so many suggestions about what we should take up that to accede we should be obliged to cover the universe every week. THE TRUTH SEEKER is edited and published for those who want the kind of a paper it is, and who take it for want of a better one of the same class. Would those who wish to reform it become subscribers and supporters? Not in a thousand years. They would consign it to the attic of their minds where a child's toy goes when he has spoiled its usefulness for the purpose for which it was constructed. We are no psychologist, but we may take occasion to classify persons and interpret them to themselves when their manifestations take the form here indicated.

On January 18 there died at Peekskill, N. Y., a Roman Catholic priest named Remigius Lafort, who was known as the "censor librorum" or censor of books of the Catholic archdiocese of New York. No book was allowed to be published under Romish auspices until it had received the "nihil obstat" (no objection) of this man. Now the point to be noted here and carefully remembered is the vigilant and precise way in which the papal church guards its members against all possibility of free thinking. Every man who writes a book in the Catholic church must be very careful to tell only such things as he thinks beforehand will pass the scrutiny of the diocesan censor. If he be not thus careful, he may find, to his great sorrow, that when the work is done the censor will not pass it, and that the labor he has spent upon it has all been in vain. Imagine a condition of human society where one man is empowered to pass a final judgment upon the work of every other man! How is it possible under such conditions to enjoy mental freedom, to add to the store of human knowledge, to increase the spirit of invention and discovery? How should any man, however capable, be sufficiently endowed to pass judgment unerringly upon the fruits of other men's intellects, of which, it may be, he knows comparatively little? Yet this is the work of the censor of books in the Catholic church. And it is this very church, inspired by just these methods, that dares to sit in judgment upon the work of our great modern scientists, and to ridicule their conception of Freethought. Here is surely an instance where the scientist is right when he declares that the profession of religion is incompatible with the free exercise of the mind. And yet the Roman Catholic church asserts that it has never interfered with the free action of the human intellect, but, on the contrary, has always welcomed the original thinker. The religionist is a strange animal!

State Senator Montee of Crawford county, Kansas, author of the bill prohibiting the shipment of intoxicants into that state by common carriers, declines to amend his measure so as to allow the shipment of wine for sacramental purposes, although he is deluged with letters from religious organizations "requesting him to do so." He says:

"If wine and other liquors are a bad thing for average humanity, they are not a necessity for religious worship. If they are a necessity for the perfection of the church, let us have a little imperfection. There is no reason in the world why a religious organization should use intoxicating liquor even in the smallest amount for religious worship."

Most of the states, in their guarantees of religious freedom, have the clause that "the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of the state." The reason for prohibition, as we assume and as the churches will doubtless maintain, is that the traffic in intoxicants is inconsistent with the peace and safety of the state; if it is not, then the state has no business to meddle with it; but being such, the churches cannot plead the freedom of religious exercises as a reason why they should be excused from the operation of the law. States do not permit polygamy to Mormons, although it is a part of their religious system, as taking wine in the communion is part of the system of other Christian churches. Why constrain one sect and not another when the practices of both are forbidden to the non-communing citizen by the law?

The idea that the processes of evolution are advanced or changed by the extirpation or suppression of any character in an individual, such as the removal of hair, and that such interference will affect the offspring of that individual by making him, say, hairless, takes us back to the extreme of Lamarckism, which unqualifiedly affirms the transmission of acquired characters. Darwin did not believe that any modification has persisted in existing species except such as favored survival, and it would be difficult to trace such beneficial effect to absence of hair. The race is hairless except cranially and at the junction of the limbs with the body, for the same reason, doubtless, that elephants have no fur; but nobody knows what that reason is. Were artificial depilation effective, its results should be observable in the offspring of women who wear short-waisted gowns. The law of hereditary transmission is that peculiarities common to both parents are exaggerated in offspring. It may be imagined that there was a time when hairless humans were freaks, and the freaks may have mated; and if they were a sort calculated to survive, as appears to have been the case, the condition of mankind today is naturally accounted for. The hairlessness resulting from the use of tweezers or medicaments might be more favorable to transmission than cutting the hair or shaving, but it is hard to say why. This looks like a field for the tentative application of Dr. Eccles's germ theory.

In giving his reasons for not approving the recently passed immigration bill President Wilson pointed out that "the bill exempts from the operation of the literacy test 'all aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the secretary of labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious persecution in the country of their last permanent residence, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by laws or governmental regulations that discriminate against the alien or the race to which he belongs because of his religious faith.'" The President thought that it was asking too much of an immigration officer to require him to "pass judgment upon the laws and practices of a foreign government and declare that they did or did not constitute religious persecutions." He might have strengthened the objection by observing that this country is hardly in a position to judge other nations so long as "blasphemy" prosecutions are possible within its own borders.

Says a Boston paper (a clipping wherefrom is sent us by Mrs. Ricker):

"Rev. Billy Sunday, the evangelist, visited Hanover one day this past week, and in response to his appeal, 574 of the Dartmouth boys 'hit the trail.' The Dartmouth boys evidently do not propose to be outdone by Harvard or any other educational institution, either on the athletic field or on the straight and narrow path."

We learn from a Boston college man that the lively students round about the Hub found no better diversion, during the revival, than going to the tabernacle and hitting the trail, giving one name the first night and another the next. Dartmouth's rivalry of Harvard reminds Mrs. Ricker of an incident of the Civil war, which she relates: When the colonel of the 3d New York regiment visited the colonel of the 12th New York regiment, the former being pious, he told the officer of the 12th that he had had a revival of religion in his regiment and that fifteen men had been baptized. As soon as the colonel of the 3d had gone, the colonel of the 12th said: "Orderly, detail twenty-five men to be baptized immediately, for I am damned if I'll be outdone by the Third in any respect." Another echo of the Boston evangelistic doings is the following, from the paper quoted above: "Laconia, Tilton and Franklin didn't manifest interest enough in the Billy Sunday meetings to secure a special train to Boston, but down in Milford, this state, a man raised a check from $2.75 to $4.75 to secure funds for the trip to hear Billy Sunday, while down in Saco, Maine, a boy stole $16 for the same worthy object."

We have received from Carmacks, Yukon territory, copies of letters discussing the derelictions of the Rev. C. Swanson, missionary at Little Salmon. The specifications are that he abandoned the care of a baby left in his charge, that he neglected a sick Indian when his duties require him to give medical attendance in such cases, and that he hired an Indian to saw wood for him on Sunday and made a hypocritical excuse for so doing. Our correspondent avers also that the Rev. Swanson can swear like an army in Flanders, and has been heard to do so. The matter if printed in extenso would occupy a page of this paper, which is more space than we can yield to it. The missionary, admitting that he has incurred the ill-will of the white inhabitants of Little Salmon, is writing to the press and to government officials to explain. Our correspondent, as we view the evidence, has convicted him of a deplorable want of candor and fidelity to trust; and he leaves his station under a cloud, according to his own statements.

A while ago a Western bishop refused to introduce individual communion cups for sanitary reasons, arguing that God would protect the communicants from infection in using a common drinking vessel on which germs might have been deposited by diseased lips. The same defense was later made by the priest who manages the St. Ann miracle-joint in New York, where hundreds kiss the same alleged relic. Owing to the prevalence of smallpox in Stonington, Conn., last month the health officer ordered the closing of the churches, and was obeyed by some Catholic priests and disobeyed by others, showing that the notion of divine protection against disease is reluctantly abandoned. The conflict between religion and hygiene goes on, and there will be no peace except through the victory of science. Meanwhile superstition will claim its thousands of victims.

Of the funeral of the late George E. Green of Binghamton, N. Y., the Press of January 20 says: "Higher tribute has never been paid a citizen of Binghamton." The governor of the state was present, with all the city officials and representatives of civic and fraternal societies, and "friends from all walks of life." Mr. Green was unknown personally to us, but about eight years ago he placed us on his list of friends by the splendid eulogy he delivered at the funeral of our long-time subscriber and co-worker, the late James Brooks Puffer, who died in 1909. Mr. Green did not announce himself a Freethinker, but between the lines of his discourse it could be read that the religion of Mr. Puffer, which was that of Thomas Paine—doing justice, living mercy and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy—was one that he approved and shared.

The insanity of Miss Agnes Dhern of Newark, N. J., originated during a revival of religion in that city a year ago, and the other day she was placed under surveillance in the county hospital to prevent her committing suicide, which she had attempted by slashing her throat and wrists. The girl is educated and refined. Her delusion took the form of believing that Jesus was coming soon, that she was not spiritually prepared for the event and that she must die "to appease God." Such victims will become more numerous as the current form of emotional revivalism spreads. There is no assured safety for the intellectuals of anyone who assents to the Christian scheme, and the door of the tabernacle will be the gateway to the lunatic asylum as long as both are open.

A twelve-year-old boy in Kingston, this state, has just got from a jury a verdict of $1,500 against the Rev. Jacob Morris, rector of Christ church school, and from Miss Mabel Elder, principal of the school, for beatings with a cane, a dog whip, and a hairbrush. The offense for which the beatings were administered by Miss Elder was that the boy "did not learn the Psalms." The Bible says that the rod will drive foolishness out of a child, but this incident shows that foolishness cannot always be driven into him by that method. While corporal punishment is largely abolished in public schools, the church schools still retain it as a substantial part of the discipline, the law and the courts being the child's only protection from the brutality of religious teachers.

The Atheists who speak in Madison square are a perplexing problem to the Rev. Jonathan Day, who has charge of the Labor Temple in Second avenue—the more so because he does not feel that he can answer them convincingly, and knows that most ministers are unprepared to meet the ideas put forward by these men. "When they search their minds," he says of the majority of ministers, "they are unable to find the facts with which to prove that the statements made are untrue." As reported by the Times, the Rev. Mr. Day declared in a recent address, speaking as a Christian, that some of the Atheist speakers "ought to be beheaded." Probably those are the ones he finds himself unable to answer.

"There was much ado in the newspapers one day in March, 1914," says the Scrantonian (Scranton, Pa.), "when down the sawdust trail at the Billy Sunday tabernacle walked Frank Mead, hotel-keeper." Mr. Mead gave up his saloon business, accepted the evangelist as his personal savior, and joined the church. The other day Mead was buried as a suicide. They told him "the Lord would provide," but "the Lord fell down," says the Scrantonian. There was no job for Mead that went with conversion, and when he found himself ruined by the step he had taken he blew his brains out. Conversion had led him to self-murder, which in the circumstances looks to be a more deplorable thing than keeping a hotel.

A New York lawyer has just been disbarred for "faking" an act of God. The opinion of the Appellate Division states that the lawyer, addressing the court, expressed thankfulness to God for the intervention of divine Providence in producing a witness, when investigation showed that he himself was the instigating cause of the witness's appearance at the time and in the manner he attributed to the designs of heaven. And yet there was involved in the act of the disbarred lawyer only the same form of deceit which is attempted when our Presidents and governors issue thanksgiving proclamations or appoint any other days for expressing gratitude for providences that are due to human intervention.

That clergyman of many swindles, many aliases, and many wives, the Rev. Arthur Worthington, whose last charge was the Presbyterian church at New Hamburg, N. Y., took refuge when deposed a month or two ago in the soldiers' home at Newport News, under another name. There the authorities at Newburgh, N. Y., discovered him, and he is now in jail on a grand larceny charge, he having defrauded a New Windsor doctor of $1,500. When removed from Newport News he was in a fair way to separate many of the old comrades from their money. Does any other profession than the clerical furnish such an example of persistent rascality?

The largest contributor to the University of Chicago is John D. Rockefeller. The son of John D. is the principal backer of America's most distinguished clergyman, who says, in language that would identify him without that qualification:

"If I wanted to make a stinking little Infidel of my child, I'd send her to the University of Chicago, where they have shut the Bible out of the curriculum."

The reply of the Rev. Dr. Theodore G. Soares, chaplain of the university, is: "Oh, what's the use?" If he means what is the use of answering the evangelist's falsehoods, there isn't any. Refute one and he will repeat it with added emphasis, and then tell another.

Some of the letters received by THE TRUTH SEEKER would be prized as testimony in an experience meeting if religion were substituted for Free-thought. J. M. Frame, a subscriber in Richwood, Va., writes: "Reading THE TRUTH SEEKER a little more than a year has made an entirely different man out of me. It has freed me from the shackles of superstition and made life worth living." We take these testimonies, of which there are many, as a matter of course. Why should not the substitution of Free-thought for religion add to the worth of living? But how do the religious people explain the fact of regeneration—through unbelief?

The religious insanity of a man whose exploits are noted in a recent number of the Evening Journal of Dallas, Texas, consisted in holding the thought that God had told him to kill a few policemen, and it took five officers to prevent him from carrying out the supposed divine instruction. It might be maintained that the person who does anything whatever in obedience to a supposed command from God, although the act may be harmless or even benevolent, is just as insane as this Dallas man. His insanity merely takes another shape of expressing itself. The lunacy is in the idea and not in the action based on it.

We mentioned recently a Pennsylvania case that should open the eyes of parents to the perils of girls from male Sunday school teachers. Akron, Ohio, has a case where Isaiah Hickman, Sunday school teacher in the First Baptist church, is sentenced to sixty days in jail and fined $100 for an offense which is veiled in the terms "contributing to the delinquency" of three boy members of his class. Parents should themselves attend to the religious instruction of their boys and girls, if it is determined that they need any. The moral hazard of entrusting them to Sunday school teachers is too great.

When Paul and Silas went about Macedonia, and arrived at Philippi, doing some jobs at divine healing and getting pinched therefor by the authorities, their bands were miraculously broken and the doors of their prison thrown open by an earthquake, so that they walked forth. No such luck favors Divine Healer Wilbert Leroy Cooper, who has been doing miracle-cures in Eureka, Cal. He is in jail there, and likely to stay a while. But Cooper followed the example of some of the apostles and led about a sister, which complicates his case with a statutory charge.

The Churchman, an Episcopal paper of New York, discussing and condemning the proposed new bill to establish a zone-rate with a sliding scale and an increased rate of postage for newspapers of general circulation, declares that whatever arguments may be advanced in support of the increase in its application to secular publications, "it should not apply to the religious press." The passion of the religious propagandist for special privilege is strong in all circumstances.

The population of North America is 109,000,000. The Sunday school enrollment is 18,000,000. Persons not in Sunday school number 91,000,000. These figures were given out on Sunday school night at the Congregational Club of Chicago last month. Are they to be taken as showing also the disparity in number, under the benevolent plan of salvation, between those who go to heaven and the inhabitants of the other place?

Paine Celebration in Milwaukee.

In spite of the cold weather a goodly number of the members gathered at the banquet given at the Republican House, Thursday evening, January 25, 1917, in honor of the memory of Thomas Paine, under the auspices of the Rationalist Society of Milwaukee.

It was a congenial assembly. Under the direction of our worthy president, Mr. Joel Rubin, everybody got acquainted; there were songs, stories, recitations, informal talks relative to the good and welfare of the society, and zest was added by the rendition of some musical numbers on the part of the society's indispensable secretary, Miss Elsa Luchsinger, of West Allis, Wis. And we shall not forget that Mr. H. Percy Ward, who has become an invaluable and (we hope) a permanent acquisition of the society, journeyed up from Chicago to deliver a very excellent appreciation of the author-hero of the Revolution, and incidentally to break bread with us, remaining over until Friday evening to give his lecture on "Heinrich Heine, the Voltaire of Germany," in Convention Hall.

Thus with mirth, music, laughter and oratory the Milwaukee Rationalists held their first banquet in honor of the great Freethinker, Thomas Paine, and everyone went home feeling sorry—for those who did not come.

BENNETT LARSON.

Boston's Paine Anniversary.

On Sunday, Jan. 28, the Boston Free-thought Society celebrated the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine in Paine Memorial Hall, which was packed from end to end by a most appreciative and enthusiastic audience, which applauded most vigorously the good things dealt out to it by the various speakers.

Suitable addresses were made by Marilla M. Ricker, L. K. Washburn, Thomas Maher and J. P. Bland; a very liberal collection was taken up, and everyone voted it the very best Paine celebration that Boston had ever seen.

William Justin Harsha is a clergyman, who writes in the Outlook: "Uncle Sam, you know, wagers one hundred and sixty acres of raw land against sixteen dollars that a man cannot stay on his homestead three years without starving to death. I took up his challenge. Something had to be done. As a clergyman I had gone stale. I had crossed the ministerial dead line." After describing how he succeeded in his gamble, he continues: "Doing good? Ah, that's the thing. I was reared with the conviction that no one can do good as a clergyman can. This meant, first preaching, next foreign missions, after this home missions, then helping the poor and sick and needy, after this—scattering. I was taught that no deeper disgrace can come to a man than to 'desert the sacred calling' for any walk of ordinary life, unless it were Bible and book peddling or soliciting life insurance. Yes, I sometimes feel regretfully that my long collegiate and theological training appears now to have gone for naught. But, on the whole, I am content and thankful that I took Uncle Sam at his word and hit the trail to the brush. For my own inner manhood has come to its best." Hardly a week passes without some evidence in this religious paper that clergymen do not and can not accomplish the same amount of good as laymen. They see that there is something wrong with Christianity, but they evade the fact that it is mythology. They deny the doctrines, but are evidently ignorant of the true historicity of Jesus, so believe that the ministry can be redeemed by strict adherence to the teachings of the gospels.—A. M.

Harry Weinberger, Esq., counselor at law, 201 Broadway, New York, well known for his appearance in cases where free speech is involved, has issued a "Free Press and Free Speech" booklet of eight pages, reprinted from the January Fra. It is good reading for all, and the wider its circulation the better. To single copies the nominal price of 5 cents is attached, but in quantities half that price, the actual cost.

The Church of This World, in Kansas City, of which Dr. John Emerson Roberts is minister, announced a Paine anniversary banquet on Sunday, February 4, in the Coates Hotel. The speakers on the program were J. C. Williams, W. W. Rose, John H. Atwood, Judge E. M. Bartlett, Gen. L. L. Boyle, and Clarence S. Darrow, Esq.

The Daily Chronicle describes "Saint Thomas" as the "first Agnostic." Our contemporary had better read the Gospel stories again. We fancy "Saint Joseph" was earlier with his scepticism, and on a more vital question.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

INDIFFERENCE.

From Jos. J. Hajek, Iowa.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Although by mere outer appearance I have been in your valuable paper classified as a minister, which, of course, I am not, this, doubtless, is either because our society calls itself a congregation, or because some time ago I submitted the question whether Freethought does not in fact constitute a religion. I am very much interested in the growth and success of the movement. Across my mind did not flit religion as the church and her people define it and as reason rejects it, but a religion of Truth, Self-respect and Humanity, the only real religion, which mankind so far has not put into practice, and as a whole does not know and therefore cannot correctly define.

A correct definition, if at least we ourselves could agree upon it, would be very helpful in reaching a solution of vital questions, but you may be right in your position, that it is of no avail for us to put up a new and correct definition as long as the rest of the world adheres to the old and false one; and I shall not press my point. For all intents and purposes names may be irrelevant, and our movement does the work. It takes the cataracts from the eyes. It teaches us to be guided by reason; it does away with superstition; it banishes fear and substitutes knowledge for belief. It promulgates the highest principles of rational morality—the only morality worth while. It induces us to do good for good's sake; it imbues us with the real meaning of democracy and liberty.

We are proclaimed a bad lot because we have our honest doubts and because we do not put our necks under the yoke of authority; because we demand proof, and do not accept the theory of intuition. But deep down in his heart many a man looks upon us with admiration for our courage in declaring our convictions. The courage of some men appeals to him, but he envies us for our freedom in expressing our thoughts—a freedom we do not allow anybody to take away from us. They may be told that a Freethinker is discontented and unhappy, but nowhere can they see any sign of it and they envy us.

And right here do I strike an unusual circumstance. At a time when the church stopped and began to take notice; at a time when the church began to tremble lest the example of Freethought should make inroads into her rank and file; instead of redoubling its energies and working the more towards a successful end, we see here and there, especially in places where so-called liberal churches exist and where they try to unite different denominations, we see in our midst a growing tendency to indifference and a lack or antagonism to organization. There are some who are satisfied that they themselves see the light; and even if they all do not with an impenetrable curtain cover a set of the works of Ingersoll in their book case lest they should lose some of their customers, they do not care to move a finger to benefit the movement, and hardly admit being Freethinkers unless it be confidentially, as if there was any reason to be ashamed of truth. It seems to me that nobody has any reason to be ashamed of truth, but truth many times has had reason to be ashamed of men. Not that I would want to bring ruin or loss to my friends, do I call attention to such a painful action, but because I am convinced that they could only gain in the eyes of their fellowmen if they would avow and show in a dignified way where they stand.

It is all right for men to see the truth themselves, but do they not comprehend that they are retarding progress if they keep it for themselves, as a snail retiring into its shell, thus giving a bad example to others? If our movement is to make progress, its followers must come out of their shells and even cease to be snails. Every Freethinker must work, conscientiously, enthusiastically. And we must have an organization. United we will win, divided and scattered and inactive we are retarding progress.

THE TRUTH SEEKER started a campaign to send Freethought literature to the editors. The mountain did not go to the prophet, so the prophet intends to go to the mountain. But our newspapers do not always stand by truth and right; they go sometimes "with the current," and there is not much prospect that they will use the helpful material forwarded them if they cannot see anywhere the people they would influence by so doing, if they have to look for Freethinkers with a lantern. When conditions are such, do you wonder that editors, mostly devoted members of a church, and willing to at any time do the bidding of the church, become lukewarm or frosty when asked to do justice or even show consideration for us?

We must organize. We must show our strength and our vitality. We must do away with looking back and looking round and arouse ourselves from indifference. Churches change. Some of them do not require a belief in hell any more; they have dropped the belief in some narrow dogmatic teachings confining themselves to the Lord and Christ example, they throw down the barriers of sect and denomination—anything and everything to get a solid front against Freethought, their main and strongest adversary; and we, we have no organization as though it were not worth while.

Of course, the efforts looking for a common working ground are being repudiated by those who do not like to give up their dogmas and their hell, but the cunning men with a greater view and better foresight are winning out. They follow neither revelation nor reason exclusively, but as Mangasarian says, try to do a little of both. They mix a few grains of scientific truth into a bushel of chaff, and by the use of sophisms instead of sound logic they dazzle some people. Even men with Freethought inclinations consider them as a step forward "anyhow," and before long it becomes a hobby to belong to such a church, and they flock there, first the high-toned and later those who feel happy to be among such.

The liberals—sometimes lucus a non lucendo—are working; the orthodox, embittered because they cannot give vent to their dissatisfaction, turn out too; they all work, only the Freethinkers are satisfied. They are over confident. They see how truth opens the way for itself and they do not lend their helping hand to her, their, and the whole world's benefactress, even if she has to pack through thick and sharp bushes.

Last Sunday Dr. W. Stewart preached here at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church. He conceded that unless the church has more to offer, she is badly up against it; he conceded that great evangelistic schemes are not deep-rooted nor lasting, but he advocated a return to the primary method of "lifting the world" individual by individual, and it seems to me we ought to work too and start a nation-wide organization, with branches in every community.

In our beloved city the whole work of propagating Freethought seems to be left in the hands of citizens of Bohemian descent only. They once invited Mr. Mangasarian, Mr. Roberts and others to give a lecture. Dr. Jicinsky spoke once on our Six Historic Americans. I myself gave two addresses in English, one on "our principles" and one on "Beyond the Province of Public Schools"; but besides that there is nothing doing, nobody seems interested enough to organize a society with a capable lecturer who would strengthen our little Bohemian congregation.

Has not our movement a man that would organize the scattered Freethinkers into a solid body? Would not such a man be of immeasurable benefit to the cause? A man who would come and arouse our followers from their lethargy and indifference?

Let us not be overconfident! Let us not only educate and write philosophical essays but work, organize, too. We have a few societies, but quite a number of communities with a stronger Freethought element than ours are left to the tender mercies of bigots or magnanimous toleration and uncalled-for pity, and among societies which do exist there is but a sympathetic bond without any co-operation. We need a union. In union there is strength. Strength gives protection, and if need be enforces constitutional and unalienable rights. A movement sound in principles and commanding the respect of its opponents is the only movement that can grow and make the desired and necessary headway.

AND YET WE LIVE IN A "CIVILIZED COUNTRY."

From Franklin Steiner, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I clip the following from the Baltimore News of January 24, 1917:

New York, Jan. 24.—If Mrs. Ethel Byrne, who is serving a sentence of thirty days in the penitentiary for disseminating information on birth control, persists in her refusal to eat, the New York penal authorities will have to deal with their first real hunger strike. Mrs. Byrne says she has eaten nothing since Monday morning.

Commissioner of Corrections Lewis declared today that he was not inclined to take her threat seriously, but if physicians reported she was dying he would order her forcibly fed. Mrs. Byrne asserted that from her training as a nurse she knew that forcible feeding methods could not be used successfully if she was opposed to it.

The prisoner is a sister of Mrs. Margaret Sanger, who is known throughout the country for her advocacy of birth control.

The above should bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every man and woman with sense or with a heart. The Christian Inquisition still exists. It will exist until Rationalism—which teaches that only the true, beautiful and good are worthy of attention—enlightens the world. We have progressed so far that they no longer burn offenders at the stake. We have given up witchcraft. The press is reasonably free when it comes to the expression of an opinion. Except in Connecticut we can criticize the Bible. The verdicts in the cases of the Menace and Thomas E. Watson have demonstrated that we can criticize the Catholic church. The church has made desperate battles to defend itself by crushing criticism by law, but it has generally failed.

"Obscenity" no longer possesses its old scare. The courts are more reasonable in trying offenders. But they have seized upon something new. Information concerning birth control has been sold in printed form in England for years. In Denmark it is circulated with the aid of the government. Every physician gives it to his patients. It is sought and is received by married people. Yet in the great and good city of New York, a little woman who gives the same information to other women is incarcerated in the Blackwell's Island penitentiary! All because the church wants an unlimited number of children born that it may obtain control of them in the interests of its mighty system of fraud and imposture. And should this woman prefer death by starvation, they say they will force her to eat! And yet we live in a civilized Christian country! When will the people in general begin to think, reason and wake up?

TOO BIG.

From E. A. Sanders, Arkansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It was once thought and taught that the earth was a flat surface, that it was the center of the universe, that the sun revolved around it once in every twenty-four hours.

It is now known that it is a sphere, and instead of the sun passing around the earth, that it is the earth which passes around the sun, but not in twenty-four hours, but in about three hundred and sixty-five days; and in the circuit rotates on its axis and turns almost every part of its surface to the sun once in about every twenty-four hours, and never loses a moment's time. And instead of being the center of the universe, it is in the center of space, about ninety-three million miles from the sun, which also is right in the center of space.

The same crowd who once taught that the earth was flat, now admit that it is round, but still contend that it and all the other planets are governed and controlled by a supreme being, who occupies all space.

Now I may be mistaken about it, but it seems to me that the usefulness of anything can be as effectually destroyed by making it too big as by making it too little. A horse that is too light to plow might be used for some other purpose, but one that is so large that it requires the whole plantation to contain him, would be absolutely worthless on that plantation. A being so constructed might retain his omniscience, but loses his omnipotence for the want of room to make any display of his physical powers.

To clothe a being of any description with ubiquity strips it of omnipotence, and turns omnific into omnivorous. If there is a supreme being who occupies all space, the whole universe is right in the center of that being, because such a being would have no bounds; and the smallest insect though millions of miles from the sun would be just as much in the center of such a being as the sun would be. So it seems to me that the theologians have made their supernatural entirely too big for any practical purposes whatever.

THE MICROBE THEORY.

From J. R. Perry, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The microbe theory criticised by Geo. H. Long in your issue of Dec. 30, 1916, ought to elicit some educational matter on the subject of why a man, if a descendant of the ape family, should appear as a hairless animal except as to certain parts of his body; and also to the law of natural selection that it did not account for the hairless condition of man.

If the gentleman will excuse me for butting in with a few suggestions, I may be able to throw a side-light on the subject that may at least lead us from knowledge to a probable cause for such changes as have taken place.

That parasites on the skin have the result of absolute destruction of hair, we are fully sure of from many experiments made by medical practitioners that are now utilized to remove hair. Many ladies whose upper lips have become more than usually covered with this growth are now resorting to practitioners in that line to have the objectionable growth removed, and there are a number of methods employed in this delicate art. It consists mainly in the application of vegetable oils and ointments; there are carefully rubbed into the open tubes of the skin, and the parts to be operated on carefully covered with silk or fine rubber, so as to allow the parasites to eat out the roots of the hair. The fat and sweat glands surrounding the roots of the hair are soon eaten up, and the hair allowed to drop off for want of nutriment. The same result will ensue without the use of oiled silks or rubber, but not in so short a time.

It is a remarkable fact that the African, the Indian, and other semi-civilized races of men have discovered vegetable oils and juices of plants, that when applied to their bodies relieve them of the effects of exposures to the heat of the sun, snake bites, etc., to which hot climates subject them.

The Indian has no beard; he suffers no hair to grow upon his face, yet he cultivates the most luxuriant growth upon his head, and oils it daily, so that it presents the appearance of a horse's mane, and shines in the hot sun. It is a fine habit of the Indian. He uses oil and a sharpened stick to pick out the obnoxious hair by the roots. His stick is much more effectual than the white man's razor.

In view of such known facts, why in the far distant past may not some tribe of men near to the haired ancestors of the original hairy men have discovered and used the vegetable oils and juices, and applied them to remove their hairy coats in the hot climates where hair became of more burden than use? And why, if so, and if one tribe became hairless, might not the secret have been transmitted to others of similar inclinations to hairlessness, and in this way the hairy coat of our primitive ancestors have been completely changed into its present condition? It is no doubt evident, that if the practice of destroying the hair was once introduced, its comforts and advantages and appearance would have induced all tribes to adopt the fashion, at whatever cost.

A MORAL SYSTEM.

From C. H. Eshleman, Michigan.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Replying to the letter of Samuel Shernow (T. S., Dec. 23), I wish to say I have several times given an outline of my religious and moral system within the past year in THE TRUTH SEEKER. To present it in detail would require more space than could probably be spared in one issue.

I am glad to know that in some respects Mr. Shernow agrees with me. But I have never said that my system is difficult to grasp. It is true it required long study to arrive at the system; but the system is simple and easy to understand. This is true of nearly all scientific discoveries. I merely hope to have played in some measure the part of an expert investigator; the system aims to give guidance and light for all.

Mr. Shernow holds that social welfare is the proper test of moral action. My own view is that the social test is but one of a number of tests. The physical welfare of the individual, the mental welfare of the individual, the rearing of offspring, the care of the lower animals and plants, natural wonders, etc.—all should be considered.

Is it not true that to treat a dog or horse kindly is moral in the full sense, and that to maltreat them is immoral? But this precept cannot be derived from a strictly social criterion. Again, do we not also consider it immoral in some degree ruthlessly to destroy harmless wild creatures, or beautiful plants, and even beautiful scenery? This is in part because it is to our advantage, but in part it is independent of selfish considerations. The fact is we have in our minds an ideal picture of the world and universe in which these creatures and conditions play a part.

I at one time held this exclusively social view of morals but was forced to abandon it. Morality must be derived from a conception not only of the whole life of mankind but also from the larger conception of humanity rising by the process of evolution against the background of the universe.

Commenting briefly on the special questions Mr. Shernow mentions, I would say there is a very definite moral law as to monogamy and polygamy. It is this: The welfare of all requires that in the family the number of wives shall bear the same ratio to the husband as does the total number of women in the country to the number of men. Where the two are practically the same, as in this country, monogamy is imperative and any one who violates it is a robber, since the act robs a member of the same sex of happiness and almost invariably ruins the happiness of the second wife or husband. It is as plain as 2 and 2 are 4. Slavery always has been, always will be abnormal. Birth control is moral; there is little difference of opinion as to that. There is, however, a lot of hypocrisy. The fact is, if people do not control the birth rate, nature will, doing it far more ruthlessly than men do. The more humane way is to keep from coming into the world children that can not be properly cared for.

THE NEW KINGDOM OF GOD.

From D. F. Sweetland, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Rev Wilber Glen Voliva holds forth at Twenty-sixth street and Michigan avenue. He is building up a new kingdom of God to take the place of the old Dowie one. He is a straight-out theocrat. God with him is no democrat (as some preachers are claiming), but a ruler who has his own way and consults no one.

He follows the methods and style of talk of the reincarnated Elijah except in what is the word of God. Dowie said the King James version. Voliva declares for the "original scripture," but he uses the King James version, there being no "original" extant.

He goes in for Bible remedies alone to heal the sick; calling on the Lord, leaves of trees, anointing with oil, laying on of hands; no drugs, no mental healing, hydrothopy, chiropractic, massage or vibration for him. He declares these the works of the devil. The drug stores, he holds, are worse than the saloons, carrying the same poisons and a deadlier line. Like Dowie, he is not content to "speak the truth in love," but calls the preachers of other cults cowards, traitors to God, hypocrites, stink-pots, etc. Tobacco, beer, wine and meats he prohibits. He is especially hostile to the oyster, which is the main stay of many churches. This is the animal that Bill Nye wrote so eloquently about in his poem, which reads in part:

Lariat, the lonely oyster,
Drifting on some foreign shore;
Zion needs him in her business—
She can use him o'er and o'er.

Bring along the lonely oyster,
With the winter style of gloom,
And the supper for the pastor,
With its victim for the tomb.

It is quite evident that the Zion referred to by Nye is not the Zion of Dowie, who said: "A man goes to the theatre and drinks in impure thoughts, after which he drinks liquors and eats pork and fills up on oysters—the scavengers of the great deep; then he is ready for the house of her who's doorway is the open gate to hell."

Dowie didn't take any stock in Christ's theory that it isn't that which goeth into a man's mouth that defileth him, but that which cometh out." Dowie opposed the germ theory, contending that disease is demoniac possession. From his patients he would command the devils to come out, but he never, like his master, sent any devils into swine, as the swine were already bad enough according to his view.

Voliva declares Chicago the next thing to hell. John Burns, an ex-member of Parliament, declared a suburb of hell, so there are others. Voliva is particularly down on Christian Science, declaring it "a mass of heathen oriental mystic rubbish" and its followers a "lying lot of fools." Mrs. Eddy once told a man and wife that they were neither male or female. The couple had been living together 40 years, and it was certainly news to them. He says that Mrs. Eddy is in hell for declaring that the Virgin Mary never had a child, but only a mental idea or concept.

Voliva denounces Billy Sunday as a fraud—calls his a jumping-Jack religion. He could work it himself, but wouldn't stoop so low. "All a preacher has to know is the trick of how to make the people cry and the dough comes rolling in."

A Zion service is as good as a vaudeville show.

CHRISTIANITY AND THOMAS PAINE.

From George Longford, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

We had a splendid lecture last evening by our president, Mr. H. F. Munro, upon Thomas Paine, the Author-Hero of American Independence. For myself I questioned the title of the lecture, which read thus: "The Christianity of Thomas Paine." Our lecturer contended, that while Paine was not a Christian, nevertheless he carried out its principles, which I emphatically denied, as Paine was a practical man and gave his services free for the benefit of humanity, while Jesus and Paul, the founders of Christianity, labored to save men's souls for a future state or rewards and punishments in another world of which no one knows anything. I need not state the teachings of Christianity, as your readers are fully acquainted with them, and also with the teachings of Paine. And I say again: There is no comparison whatever between the teachings of Jesus and Paine, as Jesus taught humanity to prepare for another world, while Paine, the practical man, did his best to educate his fellowman to enjoy the benefits of this world. The trouble is, that some of our liberals picture an ideal Jesus, and then reason therefrom.

GOD'S PROGENY.

From Albert Wallen, Washington.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Verses one and two of the sixth chapter of Genesis distinctly inform us that when men began to multiply on earth and daughters were born unto them, the sons of God saw them that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose.

Now the writer would no more criticize the above marital arrangement than he would the wayward son who fancies the charming chorus girl. Love is such a fickle proposition at best that we may do well to avoid so vacillating a subject. But really it must have caused the most high much grief to realize that his sons married so far below their station in life.

Thus the grief-stricken old aristocratic fathers of modern times, who are suffering as a result of their sons being carted away by the fair-haired dames of the footlights, may, perhaps, trace the origin of their disgrace to a very remote period.

WE KNOW THERE IS NO GOD.

From C. F. Randall, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Agnostics declare that so far as the existence of a God is concerned, "We do not know. We neither deny nor affirm; we await evidence." But just how much evidence would be needed to prove his non-existence, so that they would know, has never been vouchsafed a waiting world.

All knowledge is obtained by investigation and demonstration. If I assert there is something no other person knows anything about yet cannot demonstrate, it proves that I am mistaken or a contemptible falsifier. If investigation is instituted along scientific lines and continued for centuries without obtaining the most remote evidence of the existence of the thing I declare to be, how much longer will it be necessary to wait before it is known that there is no such thing?

FREETHOUGHT.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

James Parton, Feb. 9, 1822-Oct. 17, 1891.

This distinguished biographer, historian and essayist was born in Canterbury, England, February 9, 1822. At the age of five years he was brought to New York city. There, and in White Plains, New York, he received his education. He began his active life as a teacher in New York city and Philadelphia. He began his literary work on the Home Journal, and in 1855 published his first book, "The Life of Horace Greeley." This had a large sale and passed through several editions. In 1857 he published "The Life of Aaron Burr," which has become a standard on the career of this distinguished man. He shows that Burr had been a greatly abused and misrepresented man, sinned against as much at least as he had sinned. This was followed in 1859 by the "Life of Andrew Jackson," and in 1863 by "General Butler in New Orleans." The object of this book was to defend the actions and policy of General Butler. In 1864 he gave the world a "Life of Benjamin Franklin," "Famous Americans of Recent Times" in 1867, "The Words of Washington" in 1872, "Life of Jefferson" in 1874, "Caricature and Other Comic Art at Many Times and Many Lands" in 1877. In 1881 he published his greatest work, "The Life of Voltaire," which is considered to be a standard. In 1883 came "Noted Women of Europe and America," and "Captains of Industry: A Book for Young Americans," and several volumes were issued from 1884 to 1891.

Mr. Parton was married in 1856 to Sarah Payson Willis, a sister of N. P. Willis, the poet, and known in literature as Fanny Fern. He made his home in New York city until 1875, when he moved to Newburyport, Massachusetts.

Parton has been criticised as a writer on the ground that his books were hastily written. While this may be true of some of them, it is certainly not true of all, especially his "Life of Voltaire." In point of accuracy his works are assuredly superior to former works on the same subjects. The point on which he might be subject to just criticism is that when dealing with unpopular men like Thomas Paine, he did not have the courage, as did Moncure D. Conway, to defy popular prejudice. Yet as few have had this, he is not to be specially condemned. In his later years he became more outspoken. He was a member of the old "National Liberal League," of which he was at one time a vice-president, a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a personal friend of the first two editors of that journal. When D. M. Bennett was persecuted by Comstock at the behest of the churches, Mr. Parton did not hesitate to take a public stand in his defense. He added substantially to the sum of historical knowledge, and freethinkers are entitled to be proud of him.

His "Young Uns."

There is a sisterhood under their skins which all women feel, according to Mr. Kipling, observes the Literary Digest, but there are certain kinships which men feel one for the other, too, and some students of humanity have called it a realization of the traits which all men, in all walks of life, have in common. The financier in New York, the essayist in Boston, the mountaineer of Kentucky, have all of them some common sympathies, and perhaps the greatest of these is their regard for the welfare of their children. No matter what the labor or rank of a man, he has always a weather-eye out for the tiny counterpart of himself who is growing up at his side, and his devoutest wish is for the youngster's rearing.

In a report to the National Geographic Society, Miss Ethel De Long tells of some of her experiences in the Kentucky mountains, and of the almost universal hopes reigning there for the younger generation. Among them is this striking picture of a pathetic yearning of a mountaineer to gain educational advantage for his motherless brood of seven:

A man has just walked in from Big Creek, thirty miles away, to try to enter all of his seven children in our school. He would not leave only the older ones, because, he said:

"If I part 'em while they're little fellers, they won't have no feelin's fer each other when they're raised. I want ye to take 'em all or none. Hit was their mammy's last wish that I keep 'em together. I'll jest do fer 'em myself the best I kin, if you cain't take 'em all."

He brought with him an irresistible appeal in his tale of how he has "keered" for them. Thirty-four years old, worn, stooped, toothless, he has made a gallant fight to rear his children right. He mentioned the children's clothes.

"I've made 'em all," he said. "I couldn't hire nobody to sew fer 'em, so I jest made 'em everything they wear, myself. I've washed for 'em, I've tended 'em, an' then I've gone out in the cornfield to work fer 'em. I've raised 'em as right as I know, but I cain't do fer 'em lak I ought."

"I get right sick with the phthisic, an' I've studied about what would happen to 'em if I was to be tuk off from 'em. When I have to go away from 'em to earn a little money, hit's sech a dread on me, les' they git burned up at night, s'posin' the house should ketch fire, an' little fellers allus so sleepy-headed at layin-down time. Sometimes I'm afeard to go home."

"Why didn't you marry again," I asked, "so as to get help in raising your children?"

Tears came into his eyes. "Hit's best for little young uns to hev jest one mammy, an' s'posin' I'd thought to help 'em a-marryin' again, I might a got 'em in a mighty bad state."

"If we take the children, are you going to marry again?" I asked.

"No'm, I'm done with marryin'. I jest want my young uns raised right, while I'm a tryin' to make the money fer 'em."

"You see, we don't want children whose parents want to get rid of them," I explained, "but ones whose parents want them to have a good chance."

"Yes," he said, "I know. That's the reason I want 'em here. You want young uns whose parents has got diligence and with innards to raise 'em toward humanity. Yes, I'll pay ye all I can make fer 'em, ef ye'll jes' raise 'em right. I've raised 'em to work. I've worked myself. I begun when I was seven, an' I couldn't git much education. In my raisin' up hit was one day in school and the next day out; one week in school an' the next week out. I want 'em to git a chance to make their livins; to live, an' not be bowed under lak I've been. No, they don't sw'ar, ner cuss; an' they hain't got no mean ways when they're in my sight. I've brought ye a recommendation from folks that met ye when ye come through Big Creek five or six years ago."

We were moved with compassion, altho our annual pledges must be multiplied fourfold to care for the sixty children we already have, besides the seven "leete fellers," from the "chunk of a girl jes' goin' on five" to the fifteen-year-old boy who has hoed corn all summer.

How could we resist those faces and the patient father who has done the best he "knewed?" We told him to bring them, all seven. An hour ago he started back on his long thirty miles to make the children ready.

"Dead Letters."

Almost eleven million pieces of mail matter were posted last year so blindly addressed that experts in post offices were compelled to send them to superexperts in the famous dead letter division of the Post Office Department at Washington for final examination. These readers of blindly addressed mail not only deal with the futile attempts of illiterate but with the educated careless, as the records of the work show.

During the year ended June 30, 1916, there poured into the offices of the dead letter handlers the amazing number of 10,939,870 letters and parcels so blindly addressed that postoffices throughout the country were unable to deliver them. The meaning of this is emphasized when it is known that before a piece of mail is sent to the dead letter office its address, such as it is, had been called out to carriers who might by chance understand it, then has been studied by an expert with the aid of telephone and other directories, then has been copied as nearly as may be into typewriting and posted for the inspection of office forces for "look over," as it is called, and finally has been advertised in the form which seems nearest to the intention of the sender. Yet after all this nearly eleven million pieces go to the dead letter experts.

Illiterates are not responsible for all of this confusion. In the period named there were found in letters opened in the dead letter office checks, drafts, money orders and other valuable papers of the total value of $2,302,119.56. Such papers, especially checks and drafts, are not commonly dealt in by illiterates, yet the people who do deal in them through the mails to the respectable amount mentioned so blindly addressed their letters they could not be delivered.

The parcel post business has developed another lot of careless mailers. Last year no less than 395,161 parcels were so badly addressed that the utmost efforts of experts were unable to find addresses for them. The first assistant postmaster-general says in regard to this matter:

"Experience has demonstrated that the accumulation of this matter [blindly addressed parcel post matter] at the division headquarters of the railway mail service has become so large as to make it difficult to find space for its accommodation."

One of the most interesting side-lights on this matter of blindly addressed first class mail matter is the extraordinary number of wedding invitations which find their way into the hands of postoffice "inquirers," as they are called. These by the hundreds will come into an office more or less blindly addressed, and after carriers have helped out with their curious methods of "sensing" the real desination of a piece of mail there will remain dozens, perhaps, of invitations which never reach addressees. Students of the mystery can only guess that there is such an unusual excitement about a household where wedding invitations are being sent out that customary carefulness does not prevail.

Turn About.

He was about to propose, but before doing so he wished to make sure she was a competent girl. So he asked her:

"Can you wash dishes?"

"Yes," she said sweetly. "Can you wipe them?"

He didn't propose.

Caring for the Baby.

Some strange rules for the care of the baby, gleaned by a Red Cross nurse from essays by country school children, are quoted in The American Red Cross Magazine. Sound advice is shown in the following excerpts:

"Don't let the baby suck its thumb, for there might be a fly on it and it would get the disease of the fly."

"Don't rock the baby, as it will toss its brains."

"If a baby gets beer every day, it won't grow very large and it won't be good in school."

"Rocking is not good for it; it makes them sick and stiff."

"Bad habits are easily made by the mothers, and the babies get wise to it."

"If you give the baby alcohol, he will lose one-half pound every year and will become drunk when he is old."

"Never lift it up by the arms, because it will put them out of place. Never never, never pick up the baby by the arms whatever."

"The public owes the baby as follows: Pure air and sunshine; pure, cool, fresh, free-flowing air at night; its own private, sufficient covering of fluffy, porous materials, and the chance to be a perfect man or woman."

"Mitout."

The German girl who presided over the soda fountain in Heckelmeyer's drug store was accustomed to patrons who did not know their own minds, and her habit of thought was difficult to change.

"I'd like a glass of plain soda," said a stout man, entering one day in evident haste as well as thirst.

"You have vanilla or you have lemon?" tranquilly inquired the young woman.

"I want plain soda—without syrup. Didn't you understand me?" asked the stout man, testily.

"Yas," and the placid German face did not change in expression or color. "But wat kind sirup you want him mitout? Mitout vanilla or mitout lemon?"—St. Louis Star.

Personal Equation.

A school inspector, testing a class in fractions, asked a boy, whether given his choice, he would prefer one-sixth or one-seventh of an orange. The boy promptly replied that he would prefer one-seventh. The inspector more promptly explained that such action would be foolish, because, although the suggested fraction might seem the larger, just the reverse was true.

"I know, sir," said the boy, "that's why I chose it. I don't like oranges."

Where the Colonel Was.

The editor was pretty mad.

"Are you the chump who wrote up that recruiting ball?" he said to the quaking reporter. "Oh, you are? Well, look here. 'Among the prettiest girls in the room was Colonel Oldnut.' Nice rubbish, that is. The Colonel's a man, I suppose, isn't he?"

"He may be," said the reporter brazenly, "but that is where he was."—New York Times.

Satisfactory to Her.

THE LETTER BOX.

C. H. ESHLEMAN, Michigan.—Your defense of Paine and Ingersoll in the Ludington News shows that when it comes to a show-down your head, heart and hand are at the service of the higher truth.

M. M., Washington, D. C.—You err in supposing that periodicals run solely to investigate the truth of Christianity or other religion are "numerous." What other can you name, in this country, besides the one that enjoys the privilege of publishing your criticisms?

H. K., Indiana.—We are at this writing seated upon your parcel of manuscript, which has been placed between two boards, to take the roll out of it. An editor trying to read rolled manuscript is in the fix of a Chinaman attempting to make a barrel; he needs three hands.

G. C. B., Connecticut.—The editor whose name you suggested is on the list and receives THE TRUTH SEEKER. Judging by the number of letters from Freethought correspondents appearing in the secular press there has been an enlargement of intellectual hospitality in recent months.

J. GENONE, New Jersey.—One of our contributors—probably Walter Collins of California—stated lately that Henry Ford is a Freethinker; but Billy Brown of Glenridge tells us he heard a man who had just alighted from a flivver say that Ford was a great evangelist, having shaken hell out of more people than ever Billy Sunday will.

G. A. MILLER, 644 So. Seventh street, Clarksburg, W. Va.—The notice that the Rationalists of Clarksburg and surrounding towns were to meet in the Court House there on Sunday, Feb. 4, for the purpose of organization, came too late to be published as an announcement, but we may here repeat your request that all interested should communicate with you at the address given in the first line of this paragraph.

J. A. HENNESSY, Washington, D. C.—You should try to get a copy of your Dictionary of Grammar into the hands of Horace Hart, M.A., printer to the University of Oxford. Mr. Hart has compiled a set of Rules for Oxford Compositors and [Proof] Readers, in which he is guilty of the following: "These Rules apply generally, and they are only to be departed from when," etc. It is the custom of the best authors of the Higher Criticism to place the word "only" at least fourteen ems in advance of the part of the sentence where it belongs.

A. S. GOCKLEY, M.D., Iowa.—From 1891 to 1899, the latter being the year of his death, Ingersoll prepared and delivered in many places the following lectures: "Shakespeare," "Abraham Lincoln," "About the Holy Bible," "Foundations of Faith," "Why I Am an Agnostic," "How to Reform Mankind," "Truth," "The Devil," "Superstition," and "What Is Religion?" The lecture last named was delivered in June, 1899, and he died in July of that year. It was during this period that he gave us "Liberty in Literature," the Christmas and Thanksgiving Sermons, and "Is Suicide a Sin?" In the presidential canvass of 1896 he was prominent and active. It is therefore plain that the statement in the Des Moines Register that "Priest Lambert drove Colonel Ingersoll from the platform during the last eight years of Ingersoll's life" is a gross and stupid lie. The attack of Lambert had as small an effect on the popularity of Ingersoll as the consigning of Darwin to hell by the Rev. W. A. Sunday has on the doctrine of evolution. There was the same disparity between the assailed and the assailant in both instances. Lambert, like Cheetham, who wrote a scurrilous life of Paine, is remembered only because of the eminence of the man whose reputation he employed to raise himself into temporary notoriety.

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Mary Monico and Other Women.

By the grace of the editor it may be that I am allowed to enter a wedge in the Monico-Sheridan debate. While I admire the mental agility of Mary Monico, and while I in truth admit she has given us an accurate description of some women, she has but pictured an effect without touching upon the cause. At first I thought her strictures were but a splenic attack and would blow over, but I see she is in earnest. On the face of it, it appears to me as sensible to thrash a consumptive because he is a consumptive. The logical and humane thing would be to attack the conditions that brought about the disease.

First, I shall contend that woman is still an "abject slave" in spite of some freedom gained, and will quote Bebel: "Woman was the first human being to come into bondage; she was a slave before the male slave existed." No wonder she has hysterics!

Now let us examine woman's physical inability to cope with man. If we may forget present economic conditions and compare only the normal healthy man and woman, woman is indeed man's equal. Havelock Ellis has informed us that among savage and semi-savage people the female is not only equal to man in strength and size of body, "but is partly superior." I dare not dispute such authority. Again you have read of the Indian who lives as nature intended: a squaw who is on the march with the tribe expects a birth to take place and steps to the rear or some near-by shelter and with a female assistant all is over in short order and she again takes her place with the moving train. But this natural mother has never known corsets or the sweatshops, so why should not the natural law of birth work its natural course?

The lash should be laid upon an insane civilization, and not upon either men or women as the distinct culprits. If nature has given woman a physical burden to bear, nature has also supplied her with greater fortitude and endurance, for the male is less able to bear physical pain. The women in Europe who have taken up men's work have discovered that housework is harder than anything that they have so far had to do, and I have read that they have worked better and quicker than the men ever did. But perhaps we shall let that slide as a newspaper lie. As for a pregnant woman being unable to sit in the legislature thirty-six hours in a stretch, I might as well ask if all the law-making males are similarly incapacitated since our social order is ever in a sickly state; not even pregnant, hysterical women could make it worse. And it is better, perhaps, that the country's future citizens be born with faces like scrub-brushes or frying-pans. I venture that lobbying would be no harder than housework. Mary, why are you not at home tending babies instead of on the stage?

Now as to woman's brainstuff. Dr. Dodel of Zurich has truthfully said that women given for generations the same opportunity and training with man would in every sense be his equal. Moreover, has not the church in the past ever sought to frustrate the efforts of women to enter the scientific and political field, and are we not playing in the hands of the church when we seek to chain woman to her home and cradle? Help her to attain a larger vision and I think the church will lose her.

Who would seek to suppress Margaret Sanger's activities even though she be a mother, or should she "subtly" influence her husband or some other man to fight for birth-control? Or would it have been better if Emma Goldman had raised a family and quietly stayed at home to "subtly" influence her lord to do the work for which she is singularly fitted? Physically and mentally I would match Emma Goldman with almost any man. How about it, Mary? Why use man as a cat's-paw to attain our end? We will go after what we want and get it ourselves.

By "subtle" I understand artfulness or craftiness; our law-makers have given us enough of that. Shall we also have it in the home? Better open warfare between men and women than strategem; that is at least honorable. He who knows the past history of the human race knows that universal suffrage must come—that it is almost here. Likewise that women will run neck and neck with the men, neither lagging nor outstripping them. It is more evolution, and we cannot stop it if we would. So I am thankful that there are men as well as women who wish to throw open every door now locked to woman-kind; that even the "female of the species" may choose an avocation or motherhood or both, for with a knowledge of contracepts it is possible to choose both. Ah! indeed! If woman is fit to teach and plant the seed of righteousness in her young son's mind, who may be a future president, is not the mother as fit to occupy the president's chair? Did someone say, "No man is greater than his mother"?

Mary, you have spanked us and we did not deserve it; but we forgive you, for you finally compared us to birds of paradise. Thank you, Mary, and come again.

EMMA BRUNZELL.

THE PLACE OF ECONOMICS IN THE WORLD OF FREE-THOUGHT.

We have today numerous Freethought periodicals run solely to investigate such matters as the divine inspiration of the Bible, the historicity of Jesus, the probability of man's possessing an immortal soul, etc.

Now these are subjects of infinite possibilities, and I can think of no others possessing so strong an appeal to the leisured man of metaphysical tastes; but observation leads me to doubt whether fully half the time now spent in attempted solutions of these problems would not be better employed in a consideration of the vast economic questions arising from an economic condition that almost makes one forget the very word "soul" in the concentration of all one's faculties to provide the bare necessities of the body.

I would not for an instant be supposed to disparage the great and useful work both done and now doing by our Agnostics of the past and the present. To free a mind of superstitious chains is a deed that should give the doer that best of immortality, eternal life in the memory of a grateful posterity. And yet, in the present system of social enlightenment, there seems to me to be a putting of the cart before the horse that is truly lamentable. For it appears to me in this way: Under the present economic conditions with the few living upon the many, and the government living upon all; with labor bowed to the earth beneath the burdens of monopolist slavers; with millions toiling to heap wealth in the laps of hundreds, what shall it avail a man to know if he have a soul or not, or if Jesus ever lived? If he be one of the fortunate hundreds, he will think nothing of another world when he finds this one so full of profit; and if he be one of the millions of stunted slaves, he will have neither time, energy nor inclination to indulge such abstract and elusive problems. He might very well say: "What odds to me if I have a soul? If I have, then I am too tied down to the hardest and most sordid drudgery for the meanest necessities of existence to have leisure for the development of that soul, or to keep it pure of lying and deceit. And if I have no soul, what then? I am equally helpless to develop the mental and physical attributes that, in the absence of an immortal spirit, should be the height of my ambition. It is of greater moment to me that my salary should be raised than that I should know the pros and cons of your proposition, my friend."

The two prime motives that actuate nearly all Freethinkers are love of truth and love of their fellow-men; and in the division of their interest between metaphysics and economics, these two motives will not necessarily abort, for their love of truth will derive gratification as well from the righting of social wrongs as religious wrongs, and their love of their fellow-man will find wider expression in seeking to make life here worth living than in seeking to prove that there is no other life to live.

Thomas Paine, perhaps the bravest of all the Freethought pioneers whose memories inspire us today, employed more than half of his life in the study of economic conditions and in projecting measures for the betterment of those conditions. It was at the age of 57 that he wrote his first book, "The Age of Reason," dealing with the fallacies of orthodox Christianity. Here and in France, his verbal sword was swift in the fight for political equality before ever it flashed in defense of man's rights to freedom of religious thought. He saw as, upon reflection, all must see, that man must be fed, intellectually and physically, before he can be freed. For what hope is there of releasing a man from the bondage of the church when all his faculties are engaged in a lifelong fight for bread; when, by the criminal inequality of the fight, those faculties are not only starved but stunted; and when, under such conditions, he finds in the church his only solace for the hardships of this life?

Charles Bradlaugh, that courageous Englishman, entered ardently into the economic questions of his day, realizing that to better the condition of the people, to lessen the handicap under which they ran their race for life, was to strike a surer blow at the foundation of the church that battered upon the ignorance and misery of the masses, as in Ireland, Italy and Spain, than had been struck by all the analyses of the Bible that were ever made and all the pedigrees of Jesus that were ever traced.

If a prisoner in a loathsome dungeon, condemned to lifelong bondage, should find his only comfort in the Bible, to deprive him of that consolation would be inhuman folly. The masses of the people of America today are lifelong prisoners in the financial dungeons created for them by the plutocrats that rule the country, and before it is sought to enlighten them upon the fallacies of orthodox religions, they must, by understanding and progress, be removed from their state of dreary servitude. And this is not to be achieved solely by the study of metaphysics, but by the profound study of economic conditions attendant upon and conducive to psychological conditions at once abnormal and pernicious.

MARY MONICO.

PODUNK BUTTS IN.

In a hair-pulling match of such virulence as that between Mary Monico (whom I suspect of masquerading in skirts) and Miss Verne Sheridan (whose "Miss" is another masquerade, she being recently and happily married to a stock actor playing small time), it is the better part of valor to stand aside and listen to the screaming and watch the hairpins fly.

But Podunk dearly loves a fight, especially where words are the weapons. Hence the Klub that meets every Saturday night in the Little Old Red Schoolhouse on the Korner of Main street and the Lincoln Joy Way, had this secretary read the last rounds between the fair disputants in place of the regular minutes of the last meeting, whereupon Mrs. Welland Goodfix arose and made the following illuminating remarks:

"It is no proper way to reason to point to special cases. Darwin, Schopenhauer and all the philosophers and scientists have proven conclusively that woman is less creative than man, that she creates in human flesh and blood for the next generation and that man creates in imperishable brass and stone for the ages. However, so few men take even the smallest part in creative efforts, and so many women take a large part in increasing the race, that there has naturally some bitterness sprung up between the sexes.

"The proper rule is to let those take who have the power to seize and hold on. Times are making it opportune for woman to grasp the ballot, and she is rising to the opportunity. But what of it? The ballot itself is growing impotent, and that women should want it shows a sign of weakness rather than of strength, and those who make such a great pother over it place themselves with the atavistic rather than with the iconoclasts.

"In Australia there was an election decided in favor of the anti-conscriptionists. The politicians in office arrested the most active of the antis and gave them long sentences in prison on framed-up charges. Immediately in Sydney fires broke out until over 3,000,000 pounds' worth of property was destroyed, some of it heavily over-insured, of course. The powers that be gave in and ceased to try to force workingmen of Australia to furnish more gun-fodder for the European holocaust. Here the methods of the ballot were futile; the methods of direct action were availing.

"The Adamson law was passed through threat of a general railroad strike. Economics is more potent than politics. Sabotage, solidarity, industrial weapons and I. W. W. methods of warfare are the proper accoutrements of battle today. England promises to elect men from industries instead of from districts; the United States has many industrial commissions with more power than Congress. Creativeness is the key to the modern situation; creativeness in industry, in arts, letters, science, music and philosophy. All women can do is to refine and limit their own flesh and blood creations. They can rear fewer and better babies. If they think the ballot will help them in this good work, which no doubt it will to some degree, then I as the richest woman in Podunk say Amen!"

There was thunderous applause to this sentiment, showing that Podunk was still with Mrs. Welland Goodfix as much as ever. Whether it is her wealth that gets 'em, or her eloquence, you can search me.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND BIRTH CONTROL.

Some time ago I wrote to you on the subject of birth control, and you published my letter. A little while afterward Geo. H. Long criticized me.

The point he took me up on was where I said that people should have no more children than they could afford. Mr. Long in his criticism of me said he himself was the father of a number of children, and that he knew no greater joy than the "clutch" of baby fingers. But that is no answer to my contention. Perhaps Mr. Long can afford such joys. I am speaking only of those who cannot afford to keep a family of more than three or four. I know some families where each additional child means an extra burden on an already precarious income. Can a child coming into the world under such conditions be expected to survive or thrive long? No, they cannot; some of them die soon for want of proper care, and have not strength enough to clutch anything with their fingers, and it is no use for Mr. Long to talk about the joy of "clutching baby fingers." Babies must be fed and cared for before they can even smile, let alone clutch the paternal fingers. But how can they be cared for properly when the poor father does not earn enough?

I think the powers that be, by depriving the masses of a knowledge of birth control, are keeping the people down on a level with animals; but it is done under the cloak of religion, especially the Roman Catholic religion. The Catholic church raises its hands in holy terror whenever birth control is mentioned. It knows that if people rise higher than the level of animals, by possessing a knowledge of birth control, it will begin to lose its power over them; therefore, under the influence of the popish church, laws have been made to keep such knowledge from the people.

Outwardly the Catholic church preserves a sanctimonious attitude which deceives thousands of its own people, and others who are unable or disinclined to think for themselves, or looking below the surface. I am not writing this letter as a Protestant, but as a Rationalist. The way the Catholic church walks rough-shod over the Protestant sects makes me hold the latter in contempt. They seem utterly disorganized and impotent. They call themselves Protestants, but they do not protest. I make exception, however, in the case of the Messenger, a strong anti-Catholic periodical.

The reason I have referred to the Catholic church is because it is the greatest enemy of birth control. In fact it is the enemy of anything which will uplift the masses. Under the Catholic church there are so many children that there are more men than jobs. The consequence is that men have to go with their hat in their hand, and resort to all kinds of graft in order to keep their jobs, especially the married men. I saw an example of that today at the Wells Fargo Express Company, Jersey City—a whole gang of men hanging around and cringing for a job. And yet in the face of these conditions the Catholic church is against birth control. If the Catholic church thinks there are not enough children, why does it not "help out" by permitting its priests, monks and nuns to marry? A short while ago a poor middle-aged Catholic woman told me that the priest sometimes "almost cursed the women for not having more children."

I can conceive of no good coming from the Catholic church, not one single good thing! It is, and always has been, the enemy of civilization, and will continue to be until it is overthrown and exposed. There is nothing in this world the Catholic church fears so much as exposure and investigation. It lives by keeping the people in ignorance and poverty, while the church itself wallows in wealth. If the people ever rise to a knowledge of birth control, thus lifting them above the level of animals, it will be one move towards the overthrow of the Catholic church.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Being Kind to Her.—A colonel's wife, who is doing real nursing at a certain London hospital, was recently offered a tip of sixpence by an honest old couple in gratitude for her care of their soldier-son. The Leading Citizen Speaks.—In a country town, following the morning sermon, the leading citizen stepped to the platform and raised his hand for attention, which was immediately given him. (The San Francisco Argonaut tells the likely story.) "Brothers and sisters," he said, "we have listened to a powerfully fine sermon on prohibition this morning by our beloved pastor. It has moved me wonderfully. I am sure we have all profited by it. We are glad the ministers are taking such an interest in temperance, and hope others will follow their example until it is wiped out of our fair land."

Kept His Word.—One of the recruiting canvassers in an English provincial town was a well-known magistrate. In most cases he succeeded in obtaining the promises he wished, but at last he knocked at one cottage-door which was opened to him by a sturdy son of the soil.

"My man," said the magistrate, in his most persuasive tones, "are you willing to fight for your King and country?"

"No, I beant, sir," was the prompt reply. "An' I be surprized at you askin' me for to do it. Two years ago come next month you yourself fined I twenty shillings for fighting wi' Bill Smith, and you said it wor wicked to fight, an' I promised you as I wouldn't repeat the offense, an' allus kept my word."—Buffalo News.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

THE REASON WHY

A Story for Freethinkers

By ERNEST E. RUSSELL

We do not know which will be most admired in this book, the narrative or the argument, for both are rich. The author has pictured religion as it is preached and talked, and has added brilliant and informing chapters on modern thought about religion.

Medical Science Proposes a National Beverage Economizing Wealth, Health and Life.

BY DR. JULES GOLDSCHMIDT, Paris.

Without the verdict of science that all the effects of alcohol on the human system are evil, and that continually, the prospect of abolishing the drink habit would be hopeless. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has his own opinion about prohibition, and it is not that of either the Prohibitionists or the advocates of license—nor is there the least chance that it will ever prevail. The safe prediction is that along with woman suffrage, state socialism, and national preparedness (the desirability of any of which we shall not discuss), there will be national prohibition modified in various ways, such as the illegal manufacture and sale of intoxicants, and homemade liquors compounded according to formulas of which a number are now available. In the following article Dr. Goldschmidt, a man of very high scientific and literary reputation, gives us a dispassionate and hygienic view of the question, with a formula for a wholesome substitute for alcoholic drink.

ENTIRE freedom from all the usual alcoholic drinks, no matter what their strength, is a measure of the highest importance for the hygienic and economic conditions of a nation. It is useless to argue over the more or less deleterious action of alcoholic beverages; taken daily, even in comparatively small doses of low alcoholic degree as in the form of mild wines, cider and beer, they exercise in the course of a lifetime an undesirable, destructive action on vital tissues of the human organism. Of course many cases are known of notorious drunkards who always absorbed large quantities of strong liquors or wines and beers, and yet reached an exceptional old age; on the other hand, strictly abstemious young people have encountered a premature end by disease. Exception is not rule. We are not, however, now concerned with an exposition of the many reasons for an energetic, unconditional anti-alcoholic campaign, but may be allowed simply to state the well-proved and therefore for us guiding fact that alcohol is not tissue-building nor tissue-preserving food, that it is required as a stimulant only in comparatively rare morbid cases, and finally that its daily absorption is injurious to health.

Mankind has become accustomed from ancient ages to the use of exhilarating excitants which increase joy and give oblivion of sorrow, and so deep-rooted a practice cannot be overthrown all of a sudden by draconian laws, however well-meaning. In small occasional quantities alcohol is easily burned by the respiratory system and cannot therefore attack the tissues, but without doubt harm is done to them by long continuance of larger quantities. Fermented beverages of low alcoholic strength may therefore be allowed in limited quantities. It is a reluctant concession, which may ultimately lead to total abstinence.

When Metchnikoff elaborated his theory of the curtailment of the duration of human life by the bacilli flora in the big intestine, he paid attention principally to those micro-organisms which cause putrefaction, and he tried to show by experiment that indol, phenol, skatol, the final products of putrefaction, were in a high degree injurious to what he called the noble cells of the vital organs. I myself have included among the agents exercising a deteriorating effect on these cells, the fermenting microbes (yeast cells) pullulating in the same colon and producing unceasingly carbonic acid and alcohol. It is not impossible that even such infinitesimal quantities of alcohol in nascent state¹ stimulate late the ordinary ingested alcohol in its attacks on the tissues of the circulatory, bilious and nervous centres. In order to check putrefaction, Metchnikoff recommended Bulgarian Yoghurt; its acidity acts as an antiseptic and its well-defined microbes destroy the putrefying microbes in the intestine. But curdled milk is a food not liquid enough to furnish a sufficient quantity of water to the organism; very often it is not as easily digested, even by healthy persons, as Metchnikoff thought. It does not quench, but rather increases thirst—a dangerous incitement to the use of alcoholic drinks.

The problem, therefore, is how to assuage thirst sufficiently and at the same time fight intestinal putrefaction and fermentation, besides activating the healthy body's normal functioning. Next to proper assimilation of food, the most important item for the preservation of health and prolongation of life is the speedy and regular removal of all the useless residues of digestion. Examination of a large number of old people (between 80 and 100 years) has shown, without exception, that these privileged individuals had their intestines regularly relieved, not once daily, but rather twice and oftener, and that the kidneys always did their work rapidly and abundantly. We must therefore consider the rapid discharge of the big intestine as a foremost, essential condition for the continuation of health. Constipation is the cause of a multiplicity of nervous, circulatory and gastric ailments, doubtless in consequence of intestinal fermentation and putrefaction, just as the unsatisfactory filtering of the kidneys creates more or less ominous symptoms.

Any unsatisfactory working of the assimilating and secreting organs naturally depends largely upon the feeding of the organism. Reverting to observation of those who have reached great age, we meet the astonishing fact that such people are to be found mostly among the poor, even the poorest classes. The workhouse contains five times as many centenarians or inmates approaching such a rare term of life, as the palace. Abundance of food is more injurious than scarcity; simple food is more salutary than luxurious repasts. Once the human frame is definitely built up—between the age of 20 and 25—the body requires much less food than the majority of grown-up people daily ingest, filling the colon, the repository of digested and indigestible residuums, with abundant material for fermentation and putrefaction. When we indict bacterial intestinal flora and its secretions as the main cause of the premature decline of health and of life, the essential defensive measure must be the regulation of diet on the principle that we eat in order to live and to prosper, and not live improvidently only in order to eat. This principle applies to the choice of liquid as well as of solid food, to quantity as much as to quality. Guided by our present knowledge of bacteriology we must try to admit into the mouth and the stomach as few micro-organisms as possible. In all dietetic regimes, whether vegetarian, carnivorous, or a mixture of both, there is one rule which ought to take a prominent place in medical and hygienic recommendations, viz., that all our food ought to have passed through a high temperature preparation capable of destroying nefarious microbes; a diet I have called régime stérilisé—sterilized diet.

We cannot entirely avoid the use of raw food, such as milk, salads, fruits which often carry with them (oftener than the general and even medical public is aware of) most dangerous bacilli. During epidemics of typhoid or cholera it had been found that those who were careful not to ingest uncooked food, not to drink unsterilized liquids, not to use for ablution and other needs of cleanliness unboiled water, would live in the midst of contagious patients without being infected by them. As a rule, salads ought to be cooked and fruit carefully peeled or, when the skin cannot be detached, plunged into pure water. Milk whose provenance cannot be ascertained ought to be boiled. Oysters have very often been a vehicle for the typhoid fever germ.

As a seemingly contradictory fact I may add that absolute absence of micro-organisms in our food is not at all desirable for complete digestion. Cellulose is not attacked and cannot be digested by our gastric and intestinal ferments; it must therefore be prepared for assimilation by the action of certain microbes, and as cellulose enters largely into the composition of ordinary vegetable food, such microbes become necessary to diminish the residuum and even to promote general nourishment. How useful certain microbes may be has been shown by the experiment of raising tadpoles in sterilized water with sterilized food. Such animals are much weaker than those evolving under ordinary conditions. Sometimes wells have been blamed for supplying poisonous water; when examined the water was found absolutely pure, but entirely deficient in microbes, salines and gas. The newborn infant's interior is free from microbes, but a few minutes after his appearance in this world the whole intestinal canal contains microbes, the origin of which must be traced to the air. The suckling nourished exclusively with the sterile maternal milk has nevertheless his intestines peopled with microbes helpful in the lactic digestion. Such facts ought to be a source of comfort to those maniacs (their number is legion) who tremble before the malignant ubiquitous microbe waylaying unfortunate mortals; they ought to convince them that not all microbes are enemies, and that the latter can easily be avoided by cleanliness.

Reverting to our initial theme, the noxiousness of our usual alcoholic drinks and the necessity of substituting for them some hygienic beverage which will quench thirst, flatter the palate and stimulate, however slightly, the circulatory and nervous centers, we must at once declare that our proposal is addressed exclusively to healthy persons without any hereditary or acquired weakness of the system. Our aim is to maintain a healthy state and to prolong it beyond the ordinary limit of life duration. Those who drink only water or milk find themselves already in the condition we have in view, provided that no excesses or vices paralyze them. One great advantage which the adherents of Mohammed's creed enjoy is the enforced abstinence from alcoholic drinks; hence we find among Mussulmans of antipodal races, notwithstanding many defects in their way of living, a great number who reach old age.

Coffee and tea when taken constantly in large quantities have their inconveniences just as much as alcohol. Public health would be much better in countries like England if people were taught better methods of preparing this national refreshment. China, the birthplace of tea, prepares it as a weak infusion, in contrast with the decoction or the extract customary among the English-speaking nations, a preparation rich in tannic acid, giving a propensity to constipation and excess of uric acid. In the Flowery Land, with hundreds of millions of human beings living in dire poverty, badly clad and insufficiently fed, longevity is not an exception, thanks to abstinence from intoxicants. The coolie ingurgitating innumerable cups of light tea performs the most astonishing muscular feats, impossible for white men fed on meat and stimulated by alcohol. Improvident, excessive enjoyment of coffee will ultimately deteriorate the heart's action and may easily shorten life. Weak infusions may well stimulate circulation and sustain physical efforts. Here, as always, the principle of "nothing in excess" will teach the necessary limits.

Milk, as we have already mentioned, has all the best properties for a household drink, but unfortunately it is not always cheaply available, and in hot climes and seasons it is easily decomposed. Further, it does not agree with all constitutions and with our ordinary diet. In the end we must fall back on the use of pure water, a beverage which unhappily has been stigmatized for myriads of years as unfit for quenching thirst and for man's sociability and conviviality. Against the numberless peans in favor of wine I can only cite for water Pindar's famous ode, "After all water is the best" (ariston men to udor). This disdain of water is one more example of how man unthinkingly spurns nature's most precious gifts.

Our problem is therefore to invent a beverage slightly alcoholic, but so slightly that even large quantities will not injure the noble tissues; and of such powerful diuretic quality that abundant absorption of this liquid will not affect the blood pressure, the watery secretion being rapid and copious. This activity of the kidneys is most beneficial and prevents accumulation of water in the organism, as is often the case with over-fed, over-stout men; beer often causes hypertrophied of the heart, the so-called "beer heart" well known to Bavarian pathologists.

Another advantage of our beverage is its mildly laxative character and a disinfecting influence proved by the deodorizing of the intestinal excretions. Any tendency to flatulency is checked and appetite is stimulated as well as digestion helped.

Anyone, even in the simplest household, can prepare the beverage and may even slightly modify it to adapt it to individual taste. The cost is a minimum one—not more than 1½ cents for one bottle.

The potion possesses all the good but none of the bad qualities of beer. It is of a yellow or more or less brownish color according to the quantity of caramel. It has the smell, the aroma of beer, an agreeable, bitter taste and, owing to its carbonic acid, is most refreshing. It is opaque, but objects can be perceived behind a full tumbler. The reaction is acid, due to the presence of carbonic and acetic acid. The degree of alcohol varies according to the quantity of sugar and the duration of the fermenting process; it will, however, never be much above 1 per cent.

To avoid misunderstandings, I must insist upon the fact that this beverage, a kind of home-brewed beer (let us call it Sanitas Beer), is quite different from other home fermented beverages, as for example the one so extensively used by the population of Russia, the Kvass. The latter is prepared with flour or stale brown bread, is highly alcoholized, only slightly acid and not effervescent. In Japan the Soya bean is likewise fermented into an intoxicating liquor, the Sake, similar to whisky.

The following formula ought to be strictly followed, with the exception already mentioned of the quantity of caramel, which gives the coloring. The proportions for the manufacture of 50 litres (11 gallons) are:

- 1 Kilogramme (33 ounces) of Barley.
- 200 grammes (7 ounces) of Hops.
- 100 grammes (3½ ounces) of Coriander.
- 100 grammes (3½ ounces) of Juniper berries.

The Barley, Coriander and Juniper berries are to be boiled in three gallons of pure water for one hour; then add the hops and let the whole boil for another half hour.

Pour the whole boiling mass into an 11-gallon cask, into which has been put 250 grammes (8 oz.) of good wine-vinegar and 1 kilo 300 grammes (42 oz.) of white refined sugar. Finally fill up the cask with pure drinking water of ordinary temperature. Let the whole mass ferment during three days, stirring up once a day the contents of the cask.

After three days of fermentation fill the liquid into strong bottles (best champagne bottles), cork tightly and fasten the cork with wire as is done for champagne. Keep the bottles lying on wood and begin to drink ten days after bottling.

In order to give a pleasant coloring, add to the ingredients when ebullition has fairly started two to four tablespoonfuls of caramel, according as one wishes a light or a deep brown color.

The beginning of fermentation is sometimes retarded, especially in cold weather; therefore the three days of fermentation must count from the moment fermentation is fairly started.

Having emptied the cask, rinse it well with water; also clean the empty bottles at once to prevent an adherent deposit. The beverage when thus well prepared should have a very pleasant aromatic smell somewhat like beer, an agreeable bitter taste, and will not be quite transparent but opaque. The froth is more or less considerable according to the length and activity of the fermentation. Bottles ought not to be much shaken before opening; therefore they will not stand transport. When pouring, leave a small rest in the bottom of the bottle.

The reaction of the liquid should be decidedly acid. The microscopical examination shows the ordinary fermentation cells either isolated or in clusters; there are also a few inoffensive microbes.

This wholesome beverage can be taken with or between meals; it is a cooling, refreshing drink in summertime, a cheering, slightly stimulating one in winter. It is meant however for healthy persons; those suffering from gastric or enteric complaints should abstain from it, but nervously dyspeptic patients, those inconvenienced by flatulence and constipation, will find relief and cure from its mildly laxative action, and will improve their appetite by the bitter ingredients. Rheumatic, gouty persons, whose kidneys work insufficiently, will soon appreciate the powerful diuretic properties of this home-brewed drink. Its action on intestinal putrefaction is proved by the fact that after several weeks of continual use the evacuations become deodorized.

Children should not get used to it, but from the age of 18 it may serve as a daily refreshment. Diet should be the usual one, but it is better not to take too much sugar at the same time. Alcoholic drinks ought to be entirely suppressed.

Conclusion: If it is possible to promote widely the use of this beverage among the laboring and agricultural and finally among all classes, the economy in money will be a vast one for the nation, the preservation of health (the purest source of enjoyment) and the prolongation of life an ample reward for an abstemious, natural mode of living.

The Jesus Historical.

Professor Eccles in his last contribution on the historicity of Jesus gives freely his reasons for the faith that is in him, and he exhibits an industry of research and wealth of learning that make us respect his opinions, although we may not always be able to accept them in their entirety.

Not as controversialist, but rather as a disciple, I crave permission to offer a few thoughts and submit a few interrogatories to satisfy my own mind and possibly that of others that have been following this discussion.

It appears to me Professor Eccles attaches undue importance or reliance on some history he has adduced to establish his contention and has ignored certain very cogent arguments that have been advanced against him; and if they can be met and refuted, I feel that Dr. Eccles could do so, and inasmuch as he has not done so, I take it they are unanswerable and that Dr. Eccles is proceeding upon the theory that discretion is the better part of valor in this connection.

Professor Eccles ignores the failure of Origen to allude to Josephus in his debate with the heathen philosopher Celsus over this very subject of the historicity of Jesus, although Dr. Wakefield has reminded him of it.

I do not think it will be controverted that Origen was a learned man of his time and was perhaps familiar with all history extant at that early day, since the volume of literature had not attained at that time such proportions that a man of a capacious mind could not encompass it, and he was hard put in this debate with Celsus for historical facts to establish a real Jesus and appears to have ransacked all history to that end and, while he quotes from Josephus in other connections, evidencing a familiarity with him, yet he never avails himself of the strongest possible history, for Josephus was a Jew and could be classed an unwilling witness, that could have been adduced, if such history was in existence at that time.

Another thing. Is not the text of Josephus used by our Hebrew friends without these passages alluding to Jesus?

While the nature of the passages is such that they can be inserted and not impair the continuity of the general narrative, yet their omission does not result in the mutilation of the text; it only abbreviates but does not detract from the general symmetry of the work.

I am a little surprised at Professor Eccles quoting from the writings or the supposed writings of Paul as history to establish the reality of the existence of a real Jesus.

Is there any history worthy of the name extant tending to establish the fact that Paul ever wrote a single book credited to him?

Is it not possible that Paul himself is as mythical a character as Jesus?

While some of the books attributed to him are so composed as to indicate that some individual by the name of Paul was the author, in others the indications are lacking or point to some other person.

Du Pin, a very respectable biblical historian, says there were hundreds of false gospels and false epistles in early days, and it was regarded as a kind of a pious duty by the early Christian zealots to compose a gospel story or epistolary imitation and attribute it to some apostle, or supposed apostle, and the assemblage that met to determine the canonicity of the scriptures was attended with riots and bloodshed, and it was found necessary to call in the soldiery to quell the disturbances.

It hardly looks to me that men with critical minds ought to dignify the gospel and epistolary writings as historical documents or quote them to establish a historical fact, when we consider their anonymity, the unsatisfactory account of their first appearance, the uncertainty of their integrity and the very character of their contents, filled as they are with the most absurd and incredible narrations.

Professor Eccles claims I have intruded on his copyright in my little theory as to the origin of the Christian church, he claiming to have advanced the same idea in his treatise of "The Gospel Unveiled" and specifying the particular branch of the Essenes from which the church took its origin as the order of Nazarenes.

Now, except the mere scriptural declaration that "he shall be called a Nazarene," I am willing to acknowledge ignorance that there is any history that there was such an order as Nazarenes. And did not the writer of those words mean to imply rather that Christ was a native or citizen of Nazareth rather than a member of an order of that name?

About the best evidence of the reality of the existence of a Jesus that I have found is the testimony of some of my neighbors, ordinarily veracious but of rather unrestrained imaginations, who depose that they have found him very precious to their souls.

HUGH M. MARTIN.

Questioning the Authorities.

Another worshiper of authority, Mr. Morris, rushes to the fore, and, laughably enough, accuses me of living "in the dear dead days of a past age and century." So far from reading by the light of the past I am bringing the discussion up to twentieth century knowledge, a part of which I was myself instrumental in laying before the world for the first time. This part these worshipers of authority wish to ignore; but keep on pounding with misdirected batteries at the mythical Jesus of the Gospels, whose historicity I do not seek to defend. They are the ones who are living in the past, and quoting from men who did not remotely surmise the real truth, because they did not have the data. They knew perfectly well that the whole story of the crucifixion was a fabrication, impossible under Roman usage and law; and as the first reference in Josephus trying to substantiate the false gospel story was a grotesquely transparent forgery, they concluded the second must be. Every quoted writer by Morris and Wakefield dismisses the second reference inferentially as a forgery because the first has been proved to be. They offer no other reason. Drews admits in the words quoted from him and italicized as important by Mr. Morris, that the consequences of allowing the genuineness of the second reference was what biased him against it. Let me repeat the quotation:

"As long as a belief in a historical Jesus survives we shall not succeed in throwing off the yoke of an alleged historical fact which is supposed to have taken place two thousand years ago."

Drews thought that a "historical Jesus" would confirm the truth of the gospel story, and so to undermine its credibility he sought to discredit this reference of Josephus, going so far as to allege that the reference to John the Baptist was also forged.

Taylor, in his "Diegesis," could assign no more substantial reason for its rejection than that it was suspicious; but, he said, even if valid it might refer to any one of a number of Jesuses among the Jews who took upon themselves the title of Christ. I once thought thus myself; but the discovery, from the gospel record, that Jesus did not live till years after the time assigned, and the association with him, by Josephus, of a brother called James previous to the death of Zacharias, whom the gospels make Jesus refer to, led me to conclude that the two were identical. The facts were too strong for a coincidence.

Drews states that the first reference in Josephus is so manifestly a forgery "that even Roman Cath-lic theologians do not venture to declare it authentic" and he rejects the second reference on theological authority, provisionally, for he says: "Even if its authenticity were established it would still prove nothing in favor of the historical Jesus." What he calls the historical Jesus is the Jesus crucified under Pilate. In this he is correct. This, however, is not the historical Jesus at all, but a Gentile created myth. The Nazarenes, who held Jesus to be a man, and whose records are lost save as transformed by the Ebionites, had a historical Jesus.

Professor Smith says: "The words have been regarded as spurious"—another inference drawn from the incredibility of the first forgery.

Judge Waite, in his "History of the Christian Religion," says, anent this passage: "Some evangelical writers have been inclined to let this passage go with the other as a forgery, but there does not appear to be any good reason to deny its authenticity."

In the face of this unanimous testimony the man who asserts, "In my opinion, the second passage of Josephus is lacking just as much in evidence of its genuineness as the first one," simply discloses the fact that his opinion is not worth the paper it is printed on. I doubt if he ever read either in the original. The forgery is so bunglingly inserted that it cuts off the thread of a consecutive narrative. Josephus was recounting certain calamities that befell the Jews during Pilate's administration, and after lugging in this irrelevant paragraph, begins again where he left off. It is the most transparent fraud that ever was attempted to be foisted on the credulity of men. No scholarship is needed to see its baseness. The other passage has distracted the wisest. No reason can be assigned for its forgery; and, as I have shown, if you cast out the words which Professor Smith thinks may be interpolated you leave the whole chapter meaningless. The reference to Jesus and James was a mere incident, used by Josephus to explain a change made in the Jewish priesthood, when Jesus the son of Damneus succeeded the Sadducee Ananus. At the death of Festus, Ananus became the ruling power, and while Albinus, who had been appointed by Cæsar, was yet on the way, he took advantage of the fact to bring a charge of heresy against James, the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, before the Jewish Sanhedrim. For this he was subsequently deposed by Albinus, when he arrived. The story is naturalness itself.

It is the Christian assumption that Jesus was then dead that has caused the confusion in the minds of critics. No such condition is implied by Josephus, but quite the reverse. This passage, better than his mythical jargon, undermines the historicity of the Gospel Jesus, which Drews was so fearful might be continued if a doubt were not cast on its authenticity. The real Jesus, according to their own gospels, never preached to Gentiles, as Josephus is made to state in the forgery, but was a narrow-minded Jew. He, like the Essenes, was probably a communist, and Bishop Judas carried the bag.

That the Gentile writers make Pilate say "which is called Christ," only shows they had more brains than the man who tried to make Josephus say he was Christ. "Called Christ" is natural; even if used by a myth monger in regard to Pilate. To suspect naturalness because it can be falsely mimicked, shows that certain theorists are hard pressed.

Mr. Morris is the man who draws his opinions from past theorists. I have presented one that I deem exclusively my own. The easiest error in the world is for a man to think he is answering another when he is only replying to his own misconceptions.

DAVID ECCLES.

Socrates and Jesus—A Contrast.

In ancient history it is stated of Socrates that he taught the purest system of morals the world had known up to his time, and that his system has been surpassed only by the precepts of the "great teacher" (Jesus).

It is a common practice of the Christian historian to estimate the individual greatness of character by its near approach to that of Jesus. And it is to biased histories like this that we can trace the practice of ascribing to Christianity the progress of the modern world.

As to the real existence of Socrates and the character of his philosophy, history offers us incontestable evidence. Living between 469-399 B. C., it may be justly said he exercised an influence in some respects felt to our times. Having given up his physical speculations as unprofitable, he took up the cultivation of virtue and morality as alone being worth while.

As to the evidence of Christ as a historical character we have none to justify a comparison with that of Socrates. All that we know of him is what is presented by the New Testament—the four gospels and the Pauline epistles, which cannot stand as historic truth.

The Christ of the New Testament is an impossible character and, according to Haeckel, "he has not left us a single line of writing." Nor had he the least suspicion of the advanced state to which Greek science had attained five hundred years prior to his supposed existence.

Socrates, the Freethinking deist of the Greek age of faith, had already reached his seventieth year when for the first time he was arraigned before the Dikastery, and charged with corrupting the youth by teaching doctrines antagonistic to the dominant religion of Athens. But he had gone on unmolested teaching his philosophy for no less than thirty years inspiring his fellow-countrymen with purer views of the value of truth and a higher social and political morality. In spite of the injustice of the capital sentence imposed on Socrates, we can imagine how long he would have lasted in any of the Christian universities of Europe before or after the Reformation with views as antagonistic as were his to those of the public of Athens. Is it very doubtful whether, instead of thirty years of freedom, he would have continued free for as many days. It is no honor to the memory of Socrates to compare his mind and ethics to those ascribed to Christ or any other mystic prophet of religion. The contrast between Christ and Socrates is as great as between Billy Sunday and Thomas Paine.

In the classic times of Greece the subjects pertaining to astronomy and biology were of extreme speculative interest. The sphericity of the earth was taught by Aristotle, who appealed for proof to the figure of the earth's shadow on the moon in eclipses, and it was by this naturalist that man's primitive condition was shown to be barely removed from the brutes. Nevertheless it should be understood that the natural sciences were still in their infancy in Socrates' time and lacked the demonstrative force and data to make them decisive. Thus it goes to show that if Socrates possessed the investigative spirit and insight of Aristotle, into natural phenomena, he would not have allowed his theism to obscure in his mind the value and importance of the physical sciences and their relation to the very ethics which he taught.

It is evident that the miracle-working Christ is rapidly passing out of the belief of the more scientific Christians, nevertheless by far the greatest part of the multitude, making up the many shades of creed in Christendom, are still obstinately worshipping a dual being of supernatural attributes, whom they keep beyond the goal attainable by man.

The Christ of the scriptures declares a superiority of wisdom above all men, and thus ignorance is popularized. For, according to Voltaire, Christ's disciples were as ignorant as owls. What a contrast! Socrates tells us that his chief wisdom consisted in the knowledge of his own ignorance, and among his disciples were philosophers from whose works we can profitably quote.

Can one conceive anything more paradoxical than the son of a god who has the power to sidetrack natural law, crying on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" And poor mortal Socrates, at the close of his noble speech to the judges who had condemned him, says: "It is now time that we depart—I to die, you to live; but which has the better destiny is unknown to all except God." Science has resolved that doubt, and for Socrates and the philosophers of his day there came an age of just appreciation. Had it not been for the murderous reign and superstitious debauchery of the followers of this "Christ," the world could have known centuries sooner what it knows now.

Science is rewriting histories and correcting the errors of Bible regulated historians, who must take note of the fact that the highest ethical standard a society has yet reached has not arisen from religious revelations, but is a product of human experience, of evolution, and has a physical and biological basis.

Enjoining Sectarian Institutions

William H. Dunn's fight to stop the payment of Cook county's money to sectarian homes and institutions was rewarded with victory today (says the Day Book, Chicago, Jan. 25) when Judge Baldwin granted an injunction applied for by Dunn, restraining the county board from paying $4,151.50 to the Chicago Training School for Girls, a Roman Catholic institution. This amount was to have been paid for the board of Catholic girls sent to the school by the juvenile court. Baldwin decided that the boarding of girls at sectarian institutions at the county's expense was unconstitutional and a violation of article 8, section 3, of the juvenile court act.

Dunn, in his petition for an injunction, attacked the school as an institution "owned and controlled by the Catholic church," but "masking as a private institution."

The school replied by denying it was controlled by the church and insisted it was an institution maintained by individuals where wards of the juvenile court are boarded for 50 cents a day. The school also said it was started merely as an institution where Catholic girls might continue their Catholic training.

Assistant State's Attorney Robert E. Hogan said he did not know what the juvenile court would do with the girls, now that sectarian institutions are enjoined, unless these institutions took the girls without pay.

If this ruling is upheld by the State Supreme Court it may mean that sectarian schools and institutions throughout the state may be forced to pay back millions of dollars which they have collected from the various county treasuries since 1890. In Cook county alone it will entail the paying back of a large fortune by sectarian schools and the removal of hundreds of juvenile court wards from such institutions.

This brings to a climax a twenty-seven years' fight between advocates of the mothers' pension law and the sectarian schools. The state constitution specifically provides that no public money is to be paid to any institution in which religion prevails, be it Catholic, Protestant, Jewish or any other sect.

In 1890 the sectarian school backers got the legislature to pass the industrial school bill, which allowed the county boards to pay $10 a month for the care of each child placed in industrial schools. In this way the sectarian schools managed to get hold of county wards. Later this amount was raised to $15 for each girl.

The men and women, led by Judge Henry Neil, who managed to get the mothers' pension bill through the Illinois legislature in 1911, have also contended that the sectarian schools interests have frustrated their attempts to get a real pension bill. In 1913 the sectarian advocates had the legislature amend the bill so as to cut out all widows of aliens and divorced or deserted mothers.

When this was passed the newspapers printed pictures of children of poor mothers who were affected by this amendment, together with an appeal to the people to help organized charity take care of them.

Then the sectarian schools stepped in and managed to induce the juvenile court to send all dependent children to them at $10 and $15 per child. As a result over 90 per cent. of the dependent children in Cook county are in sectarian schools.

The mothers' pension people contend that with an amended bill, which will take care of the children of all mothers, whether they are widowed by death, divorce or desertion, these children can be left at home under their mothers' care at a much less expense than they are now to the county.

The apologists of religious beliefs who claim for them the validity belonging to scientific propositions, do not usually intend to place religious truths in the precarious position of hypotheses. They have in mind the kind of validity belonging to scientific laws. This is quite another thing. The hypothesis of the ether and the law of the reflection of rays of light by polished surfaces, do not stand on the same level of certitude. The latter does not run the risk of being replaced by another law; it is final. No proposition can claim this absolute validity that is not empirically verifiable. This verification—in the strict sense in which science demands it—cannot be provided for most religious truths.—James H. Leuba.

Long before Christ was born the Sun-God triumphed over the powers of darkness. About the time that we call Christmas the days begin perceptibly to lengthen. Our barbarian ancestors were worshipers of the sun, and they celebrated his victory over the hosts of Night. Such a festival was natural and beautiful. The most natural of all religions is the worship of the sun. Christianity adopted this festival. It borrowed from the Pagans the best it has.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

All belief which does not render one more happy, more free, more loving, more active, more calm, is, I fear, an erroneous and superstitious belief.—Lavater.

The Teachings of Jesus.

Jesus (accepting the New Testament character of that name for a man who once lived on earth and taught certain religious ideas) is not known today by his worshipers for what he really was. The trouble in picturing Jesus is to know what Jesus to picture. The gospel writers do not agree as to the actual portrait of their hero. One gives him a feature which the others do not. One writer accents his religion, another his morality, and a third his humanity.

It seems to me that Jesus is distinctively a religious character; that his mission (if we give him one) is distinctively religious, and that his teachings are designed to foster a certain and definite religious faith.

I do not mean to assert that Jesus taught a new religion—for I find nothing new in his teachings—but he put most emphasis upon what had not previous to his day been made prominent in any world-faith, or in any great religious system. Like all dominant characters, Jesus adopted what to him was essential to success. He cared nothing for truth, nothing for right, nothing for human liberty. He considered no great question of government, of progress, of education. It is difficult, if not impossible, to tell where he entered the world or where he left it by any disturbance in the social atmosphere. The most that we can do is to accept him where we find him without any attempt to explain his coming or his going.

I realize that the Christian church depends almost wholly upon Jesus, and yet Jesus as a personal force in the world had little influence upon his age. Jesus did not come to make the world better, to reform mankind, to advocate any general improvement in human conditions, to make labor lighter for toiling men and women, to lessen the tears of the world and to multiply the smiles; in short, to do anything human for the betterment of humanity.

The truth about Jesus is nearly contrary to everything which has been said about him. We have been told that he died to save the world, that he is the savior of mankind. Who says so? The Christian church. The so-called gospel of Jesus is simply the gospel of the Christian church. Take out of the gospels what the Christian church has written into them and a divine tragedy shrinks to a paltry story, told by a commonplace author. Every miracle in the story of Jesus was put into his life after he was dead. Not one miraculous act attributed to Jesus is a part of his career. These stories of his wondrous deeds are not divine lights illuminating his earthly existence, but burning candles set around his coffin. Miracles are related of men after they cannot perform them.

I must repeat that Jesus taught nothing new, and not much that was good. All of his religion that is characteristic of the man is of another world and not of this world. I regard this fact as a serious indictment of Jesus. There is no evidence that Jesus knew what he was talking about. He took from others certain notions of a kingdom of heaven and preached these notions without giving one word of proof that any such place as a kingdom of heaven existed. Jesus knew nothing of the world in which he lived, much less about any other world.

Every religious person seems to imagine that it is only necessary to say something to make it true. Jesus had this bad habit in excess.

Jesus knew just as much as the man who wrote the four gospels knew, and no more.

Without a Father in heaven the whole so-called gospel of Jesus is punk. And I boldly declare that there is not one particle of evidence on the earth today that there is any Father in heaven who ever does an act to help or save a man, woman or child.

Are Mexican Priests Our Wards?

Secretary of State Lansing and some of our congressmen intervened with the Carranza government of Mexico to prevent the prosecution of two Catholic priests who were accused, and probably guilty, of pernicious activity in opposition to the constitutional movement. The higher Mexican clergy have never been on the popular side.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER last week we printed a letter addressed by James F. Morton to some of the American statesmen who had conceived it to be their duty to serve as protectors of the Mexican clerics. At this writing he has received but one rejoinder. This comes from the Hon. Rollin B. Sanford, a representative in Congress from the state of New York, who writes:

"MY DEAR MR. MORTON: I have your letter of January 28, 1917. I am pleased to inform you that I did commend the action of the State Department in its action to try to prevent the prosecution of two Catholic churchmen in Mexico. I should have been glad to commend the action of our State Department if it had interfered to prevent the unjust execution of Methodist clergymen or anybody else, but it seems to me that there is special reason why this country should, so far as it can, prevent by its good offices, outrages in Mexico.

"This country has recognized the Carranza government as a responsible government, which it is not, and it is a notorious fact that since Carranza has been recognized as the head of the Mexican government all kinds of outrages have been perpetrated, and especially upon Catholic churchmen and women, and I am not sure that this country on account of its notorious interference in Mexican affairs is not more or less directly responsible for those outrages. Very truly yours, ROLLIN B. SANFORD."

Mr. Morton did not abandon the discussion, although Mr. Sanford had led it away from the point, which was the defense of Mexican citizens for no other reason than that they were churchmen—a vicious principle and an untenable position. Replying, Mr. Morton wrote to Representative Sanford:

"DEAR SIR: I thank you for your courteous response to my inquiry regarding your participation in the attempt to secure preferred treatment for two Roman Catholic priests in Mexico. While regretting that you take a position hostile to the sound American and democratic principle of separation of church and state, I do not presume to question your sincerity in the matter. I should be sorry to have my criticism construed as a defense of 'outrages' committed against any persons, or as a justification of any form of persecution.

"I believe that a Roman Catholic priest should have exactly the same rights as every other member of society in any country, and should receive the same measure of protection—neither more nor less.

"The two men in question were accused of a crime. If guilty, they should have been punished like any other culprits, and not sheltered by their profession. Hundreds of other Mexicans have been accused of a like offense. Some of them were acquitted and set free; others were convicted and executed. So far as I am informed, no effort was made by you or by the State Department to obtain favoritism for any of the lay defendants.

"You were apparently willing that peons, business men or plantation owners, if found guilty of conspiracy, should be executed according to Mexican law. Why should any exception be made in favor of members of the Romanist hierarchy? Let them take their chance with the rest; and if we protest at all, let us protest against the whole system, and not against its application only to members of a certain favored class, who, by our own laws, have no rights superior to those of other members of society.

"You certainly do not consider the legal execution of the Rev. Father Hans Schmidt, convicted in New York of the murder of his mistress, as an outrage; nor would it be other than just to execute Cardinal Gibbons or any other hierarch, were he guilty of the same felony. The same rule should apply in Mexico. The Carranza government is a makeshift; but it is the only degree of government which Mexico has; and those in arms against it are fighting in the interest of banditry or of reaction. Its avowed purpose is to establish popular government the moment order is restored; and it has the right to protect itself by dealing with traitors as they merit, be they peons or archbishops.

"It is true that the many monstrous crimes of the Romanist priesthood in Mexico during the Diaz and Huerta regimes have led to barbarous reprisals almost as infamous as the villainies which they avenged; but that is no warrant for going to the other extreme, and declaring that the priestly function carries with it the right to commit treason with impunity. The Roman Catholic church, which fought Madero even more malevolently than it is now fighting Carranza, which upheld the tyranny of Diaz and the oppression by the Cientificos, and which, to its ineffaceable infamy, supported and applauded the unspeakable ruffian, usurper and murderer, Huerta, does not come into court with clean hands.

"It is the old story of a corrupt priesthood raising the cry of persecution, simply because it is deprived of the unrighteous power to persecute others. The precedent established by the State Department may yet return to plague us. Sincerely yours, JAMES F. MORTON, Jr."

Years ago there was what they called a Holy Alliance in Europe, the nations belonging to which agreed to protect Christian missionaries abroad, but we do not recall that they undertook the cases of native priests not Christians. They exercised for a time a function known as "extraterritoriality," whereby jurisdiction over Christian converts was taken from local magistrates and lodged with the missionaries. China and Japan both found the practice irksome and abolished it. No nation would submit except by reason of not feeling strong enough to resent the imposition. Germany profited largely as protector of Catholic missionaries in China. At the time of the Boxer uprising a Jesuit missionary who had been expelled from Germany was killed by the Chinese; as a result of which the Kaiser sent an army and seized a whole province for indemnity. The province was taken by Japan in 1914, or shortly after the European war broke out. Here, in the case of Germany, there was something to be gained by maintaining the protectorate; it had a political, strategical and diplomatic value that is entirely wanting in the Mexican situation, where the Department of State and members of the legislative department are intervening without precedent, authority, or any apparent purpose but to please the Catholic church at the expense of American principles.

Let the Courts Have a Heart.

Some of the crimes of the courts and governments against individuals need more to justify them than the fact that laws have been passed to make them possible.

We have recently mentioned a few outrages that come under this head, such as imprisoning a Socialist for stating facts discreditable to George Washington, an Anarchist for criticising a law, and women for instructing their sisters in birth control, and a Freethinker for giving publicity to his radical views about religion.

In all of these instances a law was cited, whether applicable or not, and the courts proceeded on the principle that the law's makers and not its enforcers are responsible for injustices growing out of its use for purposes of spite and malice.

One respectable New York newspaper, recording

Now Mrs. Byrne had been doomed to a month's imprisonment "for conducting an illegal propaganda" (the birth control idea), calls it "a wholesome sentence," because "she violated knowingly and defiantly a statute of the state of New York." Then she is favored with the advice that if she objects to the law she should confine herself to agitation for its repeal, addressing the legislature upon the philosophic merits of her ideas, and so keeping strictly within her rights and out of prison.

The advice is dictated by prudence, but following it might never get an obnoxious statute repealed. Nobody ought to be made to suffer for taking the practical way to direct public attention to laws that need abolishing. No doubt an examination of the blue laws laid down by our ancestors and still unrepealed would unearth two-score of them about Sunday observance alone—all habitually broken, many of them "knowingly and defiantly." And no attempt to get them repealed would have any chance of succeeding, otherwise they would long ago have been wiped out.

Nearly all Sunday activities except churchgoing are illegal; the jails could not hold Sunday law violators whose sentencing would be equally as "wholesome" as that of Mrs. Byrne.

Undoubtedly the way to get a petty persecuting law repealed or brought into disrepute or desuetude is to ignore it until some spiteful meddler appeals to it and gives the courts and legislatures a chance to move for its abolition. Freethinkers have followed that plan; and none of them has abstained from saying whatever he thought because there was a law against blasphemy.

The laws that ought to be repealed are mainly defended by what Attorney Schroeder calls their speculative psychologic effects, or tendencies. We recall the notorious definition of unlawful reading matter by the late Judge Benedict, who said the "test" was whether the matter would have a "tendency" to impair the morals of "those whose minds are open to such influences" and into whose hands the said matter "may fall." As regards the print Judge Benedict had in view at the time, there was nothing to prove its tendency, or that it had ever fallen into the hands of anyone whose mind it might deprave, or that it was capable of depraving the mind of anybody.

The entire Comstock idea, under the impulse of which prosecutions are now going on, is based on the vague supposition or probability that certain problematically susceptible minds are going to be demoralized. It may be to the interest of paid agents of vice societies to have these laws retained, as it is to ministers of the gospel; it might have been to the political advantage of legislators to pass the laws, rather than be misunderstood; but there is no constraint on the courts to enforce them. There are precedents for dismissing cases brought under all of the "psychologic" laws—the Sunday laws, the blasphemy laws, the Comstock laws, and so on; and when doubt of the ill effect of breaking a law or rather the certainty that no harm will be done, is so widespread as in these cases, there cannot be anything wholesome in sentencing a woman to the workhouse for such a violation; and the precedent for dismissal of the case ought to be followed and the agitation for repeal recommended.

Take the application of the Sunday law to the moving pictures; it has been both affirmed and denied by courts of equal wisdom and jurisdiction in this state within the past few weeks. The Appellate Division at Albany declared that Sunday film shows were unlawful; but there immediately follows in another court the opinion that since the law was passed before there ever were any such shows it cannot be intended to prohibit them.

Discretion is granted the courts to decide in favor of freedom and the more modern view of individual liberty, and there is nothing wholesome or edifying in sentences characteristic of days that are dead and of judges who, fortunately, died with them.

Cardinal O'Connell and Professor Leuba.

In an address delivered before a Roman Catholic club in Boston, Mass., on the evening of January 17, Cardinal O'Connell, the archbishop of Boston, made an unjustifiable attack upon Professor Leuba of Bryn Mawr College, Pa., and, in effect, upon the whole body of learned scientists in America.

Professor Leuba, in his great work, "The Belief in God and Immortality," gives some interesting and highly important statistics as to the proportion of learned and influential men in the United States who no longer believe in God and Immortality. Cardinal O'Connell, in quoting from this part of the professor's book, finds that more than 50 per cent. of the most distinguished professors in American colleges are Atheists—do not believe in God. In fact, only 27 per cent. of the more eminent professors believe in the immortality of the soul. In a further study of the book the cardinal learns this impressive fact, that "there is no class of men who on the whole rival them [the unbelieving scientists] for the influence exerted upon the educated public and upon the young men from whom are to come most of the leaders of the next generation." "Here, indeed, is food for thought. Here, indeed, is a problem which confronts the whole nation," concludes the cardinal.

It is easy to understand that a strikingly accurate and exhaustive work such as that of Professor Leuba would greatly stir the highly sensitive within the church, and especially the Roman Catholic church with its iron-bound traditions. Now that that church feels itself disintegrating, it is obliged to take notice of these evidential proofs of opposition to its false and injurious teachings, which, in the past, would have occasioned it no concern whatever. The simple process in the old days was to put the name of the injurious book on the Index Expurgatorius, the list of censored books, when the author of the work would be at once denounced and quieted, and all serious consequences removed. The effect of such a method would be valueless today; and so, in order to meet the more determined opposition of the learned critics of our century, the church every now and then brings forth some wily champion—some pious "consultor," bishop or cardinal, who undertakes to meet the arguments of reason and experience with moral platitudes and empty sentimentalisms.

What has Cardinal O'Connell to say by way of argument against the truth of Professor Leuba's position? Nothing, absolutely nothing. Like all Roman Catholic controversialists he makes his first attack upon the character of the scientist. He says: "However confused is the mind of Professor Leuba on the question of religion and its importance, however mixed up are his phrases when he attempts to prove the antagonism of religion to mental freedom," etc. And in another place he speaks of certain "plain men and women" having "what these intoxicated professors seem to have bidden adieu to, stern common sense."

Now in reading the book, "The Belief in God and Immortality," we were impressed from first to last with the wonderful array of facts given, and with the unusual lucidity of the argument, as developed by its very clear-headed author. To say that the mind of Professor Leuba is confused on the subject or at all mixed up as to the character and issue of the controversy, is a statement the farthest possible from the facts in the case. He knows too much and speaks too truly for even a cardinal to refute him with dignity. Dr. Leuba has read both sides of the shield and can repeat the two stories from memory; Cardinal O'Connell knows only one side, and that he interprets stutteringly. The newest and most effective part of this Bryn Mawr professor's exposition lies in his statements concerning the decline in belief in the dogmas of deity and immortality, and especially his treatment of the utility of these intellectual figments. His methods are altogether too incisive for the Boston cardinal to refute logically; too practical to be swept away with a wave of medieval mysticism. Not being able, therefore, to cope with this intellectual giant on a common ground, he dismisses him and his scientific brethren with the highly unbecoming characterization of "these impious tyrants with all their hypocritical chatter about mental freedom." This is a typical specimen of Roman Catholic argumentation in dealing with a matter beyond the ability of the church to explain. Cardinal O'Connell has offered no argument in rebuttal of Dr. Leuba's position, but has certainly exposed himself to a kind of criticism which will add nothing to his reputation.

In commenting upon the result of the spread of scientific ideas, the Boston prelate assures the world that the people of common sense will some day realize "the wrecks, intellectually and morally, that have been made of their sons and daughters by the utterly unscientific method of these self-styled scientists." It is an unwise thing for an institution to forget its past history, when that history in its printed form is accessible to all mankind. We know of no organized society that has been responsible for more intellectual and moral wrecks than the Roman Catholic church. Every history of Freethought tells the sad story of how that organization did everything in its power to crush the spirit of mental progress by torturing human beings with methods unmentionable, and speeding the day of their death by burning them at the stake. In the eyes of Rome, the crime of our modern scientist consists in teaching science apart from fellowship with her. Recognition of papal authority covers a multitude of sins—even in cardinals. But even if it were a matter of mere competition between the men of science and the men of religion, as regards moral and intellectual culture, the world at large being the jury, we feel confident in saying that the men of science would stand superior in everything that was essential to the contest.

The claim made by the cardinal throughout his entire speech that morality is compatible only with a belief in God and immortality, is a position which finds no support in the history of man. It is simply a ruse, constantly utilized by the devotees of religion to draw men into the church and to keep them there. The history of the Roman Catholic church itself proves conclusively that the cardinal's argument here is totally invalid. If morality were dependent upon religion as presented in the Roman church, then might it truly be said that there is little hope for the world. This is one of the truths that science is emphasizing in our day and generation; and it is just such books as that of Dr. Leuba and the facts that he therein reveals, that will ultimately riddle all the absurd pretensions of Roman Catholicism, and pave the way for a truly moral and intellectual era. Too much cannot be said of this truly epoch-making work. The thanks of the entire community, both Rationalist and religious, are due the author of this courageous exposition. The only man to be pitied is he who, realizing that the facts herein recorded are true, declines to accept them because his church withholds from him the privilege of believing them.

The title of one of a series of lectures to non-Catholics announced to be given by Monsignor Lavelle, rector of St. Patrick's cathedral, New York, was "Free Thought, Free Speech, Free Press." We did not hear it, but assume that it was not a defense, but a treatise on cause and cure. Freedom of thought, speech and press exists only where it can manage to dodge the priests. On Vesey street, near Church street, the other day, some young men were giving a talk on religious and social subjects from a point of view different from the church's. They were a block away from St. Peter's Catholic church, but the priest came out and asked a policeman to chase them further, which was done. The priests enjoy full liberty to speak on the street in that vicinity, but the Catholic church does not admit free thought, free speech or free press when met with. "There ain't no such animal," is the Catholic verdict.

THE BRIEF FOR FREE SPEECH.

Overruling of Justice Kent by Judge Parker in the Case of Charles C. Moore.

By THEODORE SCHROEDER.

In July, 1894, the grand jury of Lexington, Ky., indicted C. C. Moore on a charge of blasphemy, at the instigation of Rev. E. L. Southgate, a Methodist clergyman. The Ruggles case was the chief reliance of the prosecutor. The Court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and overruled the decision of Justice Kent in the Ruggles case. The following is the opinion, never officially printed, but now republished from the Truth Seeker Annual for 1895:

"The defendant, C. C. Moore, is charged with having committed the offense of blasphemy. It is alleged in the indictment that the defendant, intending to treat with offensive levity and ridicule the scriptural account of the divine conception and birth and to bring contempt against Almighty God and his divine purpose in causing the birth of Christ, did maliciously and blasphemously publish in a newspaper known as the Blue Grass Blade the following words:

"When I say that Jesus Christ was a man exactly like I am, and had a human father and mother exactly like I had, some of the pious call it blasphemy. When they say that Jesus Christ was born as the result of a sort of Breckinridge-Pollard hyphenation between God and a Jew woman, I call it blasphemy, so you see there is a stand-off."

"It is further charged that, by this language, the defendant meant that pious and religious persons stated and believed that the birth of Jesus Christ was the result of an unholy and illicit connection between Almighty God and Mary, the mother of Christ.

"To this indictment the defendant has filed a demurrer, and thereby made the claim that no offense against the laws of Kentucky had been charged against him. This demurrer having been argued with singular earnestness and ability by counsel both for the prosecution and the defense, and the question presented being a new one in this State, the court has given the case unusual consideration.

"We have no statute against blasphemy, and our Court of Appeals, so far as we know, has never passed upon this or any similar question. We must, therefore, in our investigations have recourse to the common law, and to the judicial decisions of other states and countries.

"Blackstone, in treating of offenses against God and religion, speaks of this offense as 'blasphemy against the Almighty by denying his being or providence, or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Christ.' The punishment, he says, is by fine and imprisonment or other infamous corporal punishment. The ground upon which blasphemy is treated as an offense is that 'Christianity is part of the laws of England.' The leading case in this country in which the crime of blasphemy was discussed was that of the People vs. Ruggles [8 John. 290; s. c. 5 Am. Dec. 335] decided by the Supreme Court of New York in 1810, Chief Justice Kent delivering the opinion. In that case it was decided that the common law against blasphemy was still in force, and a judgment to pay a fine of $500 and be imprisoned three months was affirmed. The court in this opinion cited with approval a number of English cases, in which the right to punish blasphemy had been vigorously upheld, and quoted the words of Lord Bacon, 'profane scoffing doth by little and little deface the reverence for religion' and 'two principal causes I have and know of Atheism—curious controversies and profane Scoffing.' Whilst this opinion did not declare that Christianity was part of the law of the State of New York, but expressly disclaimed that there was an established religion in that State; yet the closeness with which it adhered to the definition of blasphemy as laid down by Blackstone, and the great reliance placed upon the English decisions, make us hesitate to walk in the path trod by Chief Justice Kent himself. For in England there was an established church. The church was part of the state. Apostasy and heresy were punished, the first commission of either offense disqualifying the offender for holding office, and the second being punished by three years' imprisonment without bail. Even witchcraft was claimed by Blackstone to be an offense against God and religion, and to deny the existence of such a crime, as he said, was 'at once to flatly contradict the revealed word of God,' though he appeared to think it well that the punishment for this offense had fallen into disuse, as there had been no well authenticated modern instance of its commission.

"In this country, where the divorce between church and state is complete and final, we should examine with care and accept with caution any law framed and intended for a country where church and state are one. The difficulties in reconciling religious freedom with the right to punish for an offense against any given religion are manifest. From the opinion given in the People vs. Ruggles, we may deduce as conclusions of the court that the people generally in this country are Christians; that Christianity is engrafted upon the morality of the country; that all religions are tolerated, but that this toleration, as to false religions, means immunity from test oaths, disabilities, and the burdens of church establishments; that to revile the Christian religion is an offense, but that to revile other religions is not an offense punishable by law.

"In the bill of rights in the Kentucky Constitution it is declared that all persons have 'the right to worship almighty God according to the dictates of their consciences'; that 'no preference shall be given by law to any religious sect, society or denomination, nor to any particular system of ecclesiastical polity,' and that 'civil rights, privileges or capacities of no person shall be taken away or in any wise diminished or enlarged on account of his belief or disbelief of any religious tenet, dogma or teaching.'

"It is difficult to conceive how language could be made plainer. If the framers of the constitution intended to place all religions on an exact equality before the law, they appear to have employed language well calculated to express their purpose. They recognized the fact that men were religious, that they held different religious views, that some had no religious faith, and, granting the fullest religious freedom, they declared that the rights of none should be 'diminished or enlarged on account of his belief or disbelief of any religious tenet, dogma or teaching.'

"Under this constitution no form of religion can claim to be under the special guardianship of the law. The common law of England, whence our law of blasphemy is derived, did have a certain religion under its guardianship, and this religion was part of the law. The greatest concession made to religious liberty was the right of learned persons to decently debate upon controverted points. The essence of the law against blasphemy was that the offense, like apostasy and heresy, was against religion, and it was to uphold the established church, and not in any sense to maintain good order, that there was a law against blasphemy. The most superficial examination of the chapter in Blackstone treating of offenses against God and religion, must convince any mind that the sole aim and object of these laws was to preserve the Christian faith, as it was then understood and accepted by the established church. It may seem to us that the punishments for these offenses were severe in the time of Blackstone, but they had then been greatly mitigated, as the stake and fagot had been of but frequent use in propagating what was deemed to be the true religion. Even Blackstone complains that the definition of heresy had been too uncertain, and that the subject had been liable to be burned for what he had not understood to be heresy until it was decided to be so by the ecclesiastical judge who interpreted the canonical scriptures. To deny any one of the persons of the trinity, or to allege that there were more gods than one, was a heresy and was punished in the same manner as apostasy.

"Blasphemy is a crime grown from the same parent stem as apostasy and heresy. It is one of a class of offenses designed for the same general purpose, the fostering and protecting of a religion accepted by the state as the true religion, whose precepts and tenets it was thought all good subjects should observe. In the code of laws of a country enjoying absolute religious freedom there is no place for the common law crime of blasphemy. Unsuitable to the spirit of the age, its enforcement would be unsuited to the constitution of this state, and this crime must be considered a stranger to the laws of Kentucky.

"Wherefore it is adjudged that the demurrer be and it is hereby sustained, the indictment is dismissed, the defendant's bail bond is quashed, and the defendant is dismissed hence without delay. To this ruling of the Court the Commonwealth of Kentucky excepts, and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted."

A careful examination of the Kentucky reports has failed to show that this appeal was ever perfected. Evidently the attorney-general became satisfied with the law as laid down by Judge Parker.

To say that the common law as to blasphemy was, by the framers of the New York Constitution, designed to be continued in force, is to assume without evidence, that the Colonists, without cause, deliberately repudiated those two enactments of the General Assembly which had declared that, as between contending Christians, the test of psychology tendency should no longer determine guilt, and that only actual disturbance of the realm should be foundation for a criminal prosecution against religionists, who otherwise might be called "blasphemers." Justice Kent's ruling was a retrogression, in conflict with the evidence that the Constitution was designed to be progressive. That is to say, the Constitution, construed as a whole, was evidently designed to make applicable to all as a matter of right, what had been previously a privilege and modification of the common law, for only those who believed in God by Christ.

Let us now endeavor to study the constitutional provision already quoted, in connection with a brief recapitulation of colonial history as to toleration. And let us proceed with that study with a view to understanding the impulses and ideas which inspired the choice of constitutional language rather than to be content with the mere words themselves.

We know of the Established Church in England. We have seen the Treaty of Capitulation confirm certain privileges for the Dutch colonial church. We have seen how the same rights were subsequently extended so as to make them the equal property of all denominations in the colony. In the light of these prior events the language of the Constitution first above quoted becomes plain. "No denomination of Christians, or their ministers" are to be established or maintained. In other words, all privileges heretofore extended to Christians, as such, are now withdrawn, whether arising from the common law or colonial enactment.

The Colonial Declaration of Rights and the Royal Charter had provided toleration for all those "which profess faith in God by Jesus Christ." A very contrary spirit is breathed in the Constitution which declares its purpose to protect the citizen "against that spiritual oppression and intolerance wherewith the bigotry and ambition of weak and wicked priests and princes have scourged mankind." To make this changed sentiment effective they also provide that "no minister of the Gospel or priest of any pretence or description whatever be eligible to or capable of holding any civil or military office or place within this state."

To my mind it seems impossible for a man of unprejudiced intelligence to read these provisions in the light of the antecedent controversy and Declaration of Rights, and the preamble to the constitutional provisions above quoted, and then draw the conclusion that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to abolish the common law as to blasphemy. Indeed, Mr. Justice Kent does not claim to do any such thing. He did not even consider the colonial controversies which the Constitution was designed to settle. He did not attempt to coordinate Section 39, or the preamble to Section 38, with the Declaration of Right contained in Section 38. If he had undertaken to construe these together, in an effort to discover the purpose of the Constitutional Convention, he could never have said, in 1811, that the common law offense of blasphemy was a part of the law of New York state.

It had been pointed out that in 1811, when Justice Kent decided the Ruggles case, the Constitution of New York contained no guarantee of freedom of speech and press. That provision was first adopted in the constitutional convention of 1821. It may help us toward an understanding of the Ruggles case in its relation to constitutional free speech to ascertain a little more in detail the attitude of Justice Kent toward the free speech issue.

The very celebrated case of the People vs. Crosswell (3 Johnson's Cases, 337) makes clear the free speech issue. It will be remembered that Milton, Luther, Roger Williams, Thomas Jefferson and their adherents demanded in the interests of free speech that the test of the psychologic tendency to promote disorder should be abolished, and that only actual disorder should be punished. This of course was in opposition to the view promulgated by the English courts generally and summarized by Blackstone. It will be interesting to understand Justice Kent's attitude upon that issue, because we can then know best how to value his opinion in the Ruggles case as an authority on constitutional interpretation.

The issue in the Crosswell case was the right in certain libels to publish truth with impunity, with good motives and with justifiable ends, and, as inseparably associated with this, the right of the jury to pass upon the intent and psychologic tendency. These rights were upheld by Justice Kent in an opinion which took a wide range. Let us study his words upon freedom of utterance.

He first quotes Lord Camden as saying: "A paper that tended to excite sedition was libelous." And a discussion with that thesis, Justice Kent called "a vigorous and eloquent defense of the freedom of the press." I should rather call it a vigorous and eloquent misapplication of the word "freedom of the press" to justify the English system of censorship of the press.

Further on, Justice Kent comments on the Virginia Resolution on tolerance, and he uses this language: "I am far from intending that these authorities mean, by the freedom of the press, a press wholly beyond the reach of the law, for this would be emphatically Pandora's box, the source of every evil. And yet the house of delegates, in Virginia, by their resolution of the 7th January, 1800, and which appears to have been intended for the benefit and instruction of the Union, came forward as the advocates of a press totally unshackled, and declare, in so many words, that 'the baneful tendency of the sedition act was but little diminished by the privilege in giving in evidence the truth of the matter contained in political writings.' They seem also to consider it as the exercise of a pernicious influence, and as striking at the root of free discussion, to punish, even for a false and malicious writing, published with intent to defame those who administer the government. If this doctrine was to prevail, the press would become a pest, and destroy the public morals. Against such a commentary upon the freedom of the American press, I beg leave to enter my protest. The founders of our governments were too wise and too just ever to have intended, by the freedom of the press, a right to circulate falsehood as well as truth, or that the press should be the lawful vehicle of malicious defamation, or an engine for evil and designing men, to cherish, for mischievous purposes, sedition, irreligion and impurity. Such an abuse of the press would be incompatible with the existence and good order of civil society. The true rule of law is that the intent and tendency of the publication is, in every instance, to be the substantial inquiry on the trial, and that the truth is admissible in evidence, to explain that intent, and not in every instance to justify it."

Here, then, we have a clean-cut issue between the views of Jefferson and Kent on the rightful limits of toleration. Before that the people of New York, in the Convention of 1788, had, according to Kent (page 391) "declared unanimously that the freedom of the press was a right which could not be abridged or violated." This convention was considering matters of Federal concern, and, while it expressed the sentiments of the people of New York, it had no authority to bind the New York court. Therefore, Justice Kent even went so far as to ignore it entirely in the Ruggles case, where it would still have shed some light on the probable meaning of the constitutional provisions for a separation of church and state which he had under consideration.

Since the Croswell decision, the United States Supreme Court (in U. S. v. Reynolds, 98 U. S. 163) upheld Jefferson, and by that same act disavowed Justice Kent as an authority on the limits of religious liberty. In the Reynolds case the court quotes approvingly the Jeffersonian conception of religious liberty of which Justice Kent disapproved.

Furthermore, the people of New York also overruled Mr. Justice Kent in their constitutional convention of 1821. Mr. Justice Kent was a distinguished member of that convention, and opposed the free speech clause when it came up for adoption. The vote was 97 for such a provision; Justice Kent and eight others voted against it. (Journal of the Convention, pp. 275-6.) This constitutional guarantee was necessary to annul the restrictive effect of Justice Kent's decisions in the Ruggles case, and the inconclusive result of the decision in the Croswell case. If Justice Kent had expressed a different view about existing constitutional provisions in relation to tolerance and liberty of the press, there would have been less need for the free speech clause in the constitution of 1821. Two Sights in Baltimore.

Baltimore, with its six hundred thousand population, is one of the most interesting as well as one of the most beautiful cities in the United States. I stopped here on business and determined "to see the sights." One of the oldest cities of the country, it still bears evidence of its antiquity. While others of our early cities have torn down their old buildings, and erected modern ones, Baltimore has retained them, kept them in repair and added modern conveniences.

Two things here were of special interest to me. One, that the city contains the grave of Edgar Allan Poe. The other, that it is the residence of Cardinal Gibbons, the head of the American Roman Catholic hierarchy and called "Primate of the United States." I was determined to see both. I was not long in the city when I stood at the corner of the Westminster churchyard, where the ashes of the great poet, whose works I have admired from my youth, repose under a plain substantial granite monument on which is carved his likeness. Tennyson thought Poe the greatest American poet, and I am inclined to think him correct. Being a French, Italian and Spanish scholar, he became cosmopolitan in his literary tastes, and revolutionized American literature both in prose and poetry. While he died at the early age of forty, in that short time he made a greater impression than has any other American poet in the same length of time. Had Longfellow, Whittier or Lowell died at the same age as did Poe, I doubt if their works written up to that time would have given them the fame that is his. What his religious views were is not definitely stated, and possibly not definitely known. That they were orthodox is not probable. But as I stood by, plucking several ivy leaves as mementoes, while the lines of "The Raven," "Annabel Lee" and "The Bells" passed through my memory, I suddenly said to myself, "You may not have died in the Lord, but your works have surely followed you."

The next point of attraction was the Cathedral and Cardinal Gibbons, of whom I had heard and read of so much. I was anxious to see him—of course only from curiosity. Gibbons was born in Baltimore in 1834, making him now eighty-two years old; was taken to Ireland in infancy, where he remained until the age of seventeen, when he returned to the United States; studied for the priesthood and was ordained in 1861. He was appointed bishop of North Carolina in 1868 by Pius IX, and in 1872 was transferred to the diocese of Richmond, Virginia. In 1877 he was appointed coadjutor to the archbishop of Baltimore with right of succession. It was not long, the archbishop dying, before the succession occurred. In 1886 he was made a cardinal by Leo XIII, with the title "Primate of the United States." I was informed by a Catholic that the cardinal was in the city, and that when here he said mass at the cathedral every morning at seven o'clock; hence, on the following morning I made my way toward the sanctuary. The diocese of Baltimore is the oldest in the United States, having been established in 1789 by its first archbishop, John Carroll, a brother of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, under whose incumbency the cathedral was erected. On the outside there is nothing pretentious about the building. The architecture inside and out resembles somewhat that of St. Peter's in New York city. The interior is magnificent. Paintings, statuary, costly stones and marble adorn it. The altar railing must have cost a fortune, to say nothing of the other adornments. There are five altars; one in the center of the chancel facing the people. On the sides of this one are two others in the same position. Against the altar rail, facing each other, are two more. I took a seat well to the front that I might have a good view of the performance and the performers. Promptly at seven o'clock the candles on the front left side altar were lighted and Cardinal Gibbons appeared, accompanied by two altar boys and a man in ordinary dress.

The cardinal is built tall, thin and wiry. His face, unlike the faces of most priests, has a pleasant look, though his eyes show the deep priestly cunning. Before me stood the man who has had more influence with four Presidents than any other private citizen, and who has walked into the White House, given his orders, and, except in the matter of Mexico, has been obeyed. About ten feet from the altar stands his throne, a raised, high-backed chair, over which is a rich, red satin canopy; for a cardinal is a "prince" and must have a throne. My observation has previously been that priests before saying mass put on their robes in an ante-room, or more properly a dressing room, called in ecclesiastical language the "sacristy." With Cardinal Gibbons all this is different. He appeared in a plain black cassock, with a red sash at the waist and a chain bearing a cross about his neck. On his head were two red caps, one a skull cap covering merely the crown of his head, the other, the common cap worn by priests, containing three or four partitions on the top and called in the same ecclesiastical language the biretta. This was removed and placed near the throne. The plainly dressed man and the two altar boys, who got on their knees when they were in front of the cardinal, proceeded to dress him in the sacred garments which lay on the altar. The first resembled a towel, which they threw, shawl-fashion, over his shoulder. The name of this I do not know. The next article of apparel they put on him had the appearance of a nightshirt but is called the alb. Next came the outer garment called the chasuble—a long double bib sandwiching the wearer by covering both breast and back until it reaches below the hips; open at the sides with a hole in the top for the head to go in and out. On each side of this garment, which, by the way, was of silk or satin, of a blue color (they have different colors for different seasons), a cross was wrought by needle-work. Next was the putting on of the stoles. These are decorated bands, one long one going over the shoulders and extending about as far down as the chasuble. They were now through. Cardinal James was attired so that when he said at the proper moment Et verbum caro factum est ("And the word was made flesh") the bread and wine became the body and blood of Jesus. There was no music, as this was "low mass," which means that it was merely read, not sung. The cardinal had been performing but a short time when the candles on the center altar were lighted, and a fat priest, who looked as though he enjoyed all the good things of life, appeared and began the same performances already being conducted by Cardinal James at the side altar. After the fat one had proceeded for a time, those who had been to confession, four-fifths women, came up to the altar rail to take the communion, or eat the body of Jesus which the cardinal and the priest had made. They were not permitted to drink his blood, as they are in a Protestant church, for in the Catholic sanctuary that is the prerogative of the priest. It was administered by the fat father. When the cardinal had finished his part, he ceased playing, and the man and two altar boys who had dressed him began to undo him. By this time the altar on the rear left side was lighted, and a handsome young priest appeared before it, starting the same performance over again. How cheap the body and blood of Jesus must have been on this eventful morning! Cardinal Gibbons being disrobed, finally disappeared, as did the fat priest also, and I did likewise, being more firmly than ever impressed with the audacious imposture, cunning fraud, and mean hypocrisy of religious ceremonial. And the Protestant church, what there is of it, is just as bad as the Catholic.

Chat from Chicago.

The Hub of the Rationalist Universe having been removed from New York to Chicago makes this city a fit setting for the memorable Paine-Ingersoll banquet which was held in the Auditorium, the finest place in the city, last night, Tuesday, Jan. 30. Oh! this beautiful, very large audience room! Has New York in all its history ever had so fine a setting in which to do honor to our illustrious dead? "The rosy" was absent in toto. Aqua pura, clear as crystal, fortified by a demitasse at the end of the tasty and tasteful menu, was the only drink indulged in, the aqua particularly flowing freely and constantly. Frowns will soon greet the wine bottle. It will be banished from every Rationalist banquet table in a not distant future.

E. C. Reichwald, secretary of the American Secular Union, devoted much time and labor to bring about this perfect event. It would have done your soul good to see such large numbers of beautifully gowned women and dolled-out men.

I have been trying this long while to convince people that it is women chiefly who achieve results in any given direction. A very prominent Rationalist of Chi (short for Chicago), whose name I refuse to divulge, tried to get results from two Rationalist top-liners of New York whose names I will also suppress, though I'll say one of them was an editor. "Nothing doing," as you may surmise. But that little mite of a Chicago chatterer then, by request, put her shoulder to the wheel and it turned "to beat the band." Things happened when her messages got to Mrs. Eva A. Ingersoll and Dr. Mary Bond Foote. Both of them labored manfully (drat that word! Should say labored womanfully) to help make this the greatest Paine-Ingersoll banquet in history. With the enthusiasm of a girl, Mrs. Ingersoll at the earliest moment sent the chatterer this night telegram: "Am sending you by express eight hundred copies Edgar Lee Masters' poem on my husband for souvenirs. Have done everything possible to obtain satisfactory phonograph records, but without success, even after consulting Mr. Edison. Will send my own message by wire to Mr. Reichwald on the twenty-ninth. With deepest appreciation for the magnificent work you are doing, faithfully, EVA A. INGERSOLL."

Equally active was Dr. Mary E. Bond Foote, widow of Dr. Ned Foote, who went instantly out to Larchmont and brought down the desired record to New York, and she then scoured the city to find a phonograph upon which to transcribe it, and if she was successful she would express it to Chicago. All her efforts were unavailing, and thus I regret to say that the "Master's Voice" was not heard by the many expectant guests at the great banquet.

The long speakers' table was elevated above the other tables, and was lighted by most elegant candelabra. Back and above this table were very large framed pictures of Paine and Ingersoll. I fancied that the Great Commoner and Internationalist, the man of three countries, England, France and America, was about to step out of the frame and greet us.

The dear face of Colonel Ingersoll beamed upon us, and that bold, half defiant piercing gaze of the eyes seemed to defy any future to harm the great cause of Rationalism.

You may search the world over and you will not find a finer specimen of manhood than the chairman, E. C. Wentworth, president of the Chicago Rationalist Association. And my! What an adept he is at the very necessary art of soft-soaping his speakers. Mr. Wentworth has always been too much of a business man to pose as an orator. He read his effective address with much earnestness.

Mr. Wentworth's muse furnishes nearly all the poems in Athena, the local magazine. He informed us that at last year's banquet some four hundred speakers were on the program and about three hundred and eighty-six of them had to go home in deep disappointment. They did not get a look-in at the center of the stage. Don't I know how to feel for them, and for the numberless disappointed orators at this banquet? I do. My long name was on the program beside those of the big-wigs, and how it did make my heart flutter to see it there! That of itself was the limelight. I was to have five minutes in which to get over a "this-is-so-sudden" impromptu speech to the wildly expectant audience. I sat shivering the whole evening, expecting to be announced, but I was left lingering out in the cold.

The only good achieved by Chicago's loss of John Emerson Roberts, said Wentworth, is that in lieu of reaching only two or three thousand people here, he now preaches to his ten thousand in Kansas City.

Listen, friends! It was a lurid speech that John Emerson made. It fairly glared with hell fire and damnation all the way through, so much so that the speakers who followed him, not finding any left-over fireworks to use themselves, admonished him upon the danger of his "hellish" address. They were jealous. You understand. I think myself that John Emerson went to the Bible for every torrid word he used. Evidently he considered his playful profanity indispensable on this occasion. He was determined that the ribs of his hearers should literally collapse with laughter, for the number of reminiscences and humorous stories that he told of Ingersoll would keep the world's sides shaking for a month of Sundays.

At the close of Roberts' speech the applause was long and loud and he was forced to rise in acknowledgment, even a second time.

Clarence Darrow spoke on Thomas Paine, and "a fine ear could not help hearing the falling timbers of Christian dogma" throughout his forceful speech.

Darrow's personality is peculiar but interesting. He doesn't care a hang for the hang of his clothes, and his tie looks as though he had tied it while he was catching a car. His clothes do not fit him, and yet they do too. His coat and vest are full of wrinkles, intellectual wrinkles to fit the manifold windings of his big brain. His voice is deep and resonant. We girls like that, too. Sad to relate, however, he wears a stringlet of his very straight hair down across his massive brow, and that's horrid.

Next speaker in line was our onliest own, H. Percy Ward. The blame for Percy Ward's conversion to Rationalism rests upon the shoulders of his English bishop. The bishop abjured him as he loved his soul's salvation not to read or even touch the worst book in the world, Tom Paine's "Age of Reason." Of course, a young Methodist minister like Percy just itched to reach the dangerous forbidden fruit, and, as luck would have it, the fruit lay right within reach of his hand the very first time that he strolled past a book store. He ate of it eagerly and hungrily, and the result was that he could no longer occupy his pulpit, which had become "a coward's castle."

Chairman Wentworth introduced Dr. Sam Atkinson in very happy terms. He touched the button, so to speak, and Sam did the rest. Sam is such a good looking, you know. In that, as in his fine qualities as a speaker, he is excelled by none, and equalled by few. His speech was way up to date, and his audience was admiringly with him every moment as he outlined the Rationalist features of his lectures with the moving pictures. I have heard from authoritative sources that the Chicago Rationalist Association will take steps to have Dr. Sam lecture.

All were impressed with the fine souvenir poem of Edgar Lee Masters, so artistically gotten up, and presented by Eva A. Ingersoll. And the souvenir programs were things of beauty, having excellent pictures of Paine and Ingersoll on them, and the coloring of them was exquisite. Still another souvenir appeared to cap the climax in the form of the last Ingersoll number of Athena, Lucy Waite, editor.

But one thing could have atoned for the absence of our great Rationalist writer, John Remsburg, and that would have been the presence of his last book on Thomas Paine. And we did expect Col. E. A. Stevens to be with us, carrying an impromptu poem in his swallowtail pocket. But he told me he was "up to his neck" in his responsible work for the National Association of Vicksburg Veterans. This is the proposed National Memorial Reunion and Peace Jubilee of the Union and Confederate survivors of the armies and navies, to be held on the Government domain within the Vicksburg National Military Park next October. Colonel Stevens is one of the Council of Administration.

LIBBY CULBERTSON MACDONALD.

In York, Pennsylvania, the celebration of the Paine anniversary was conducted by the local York County Socialist party. That is an appropriate place to remember Paine, for during the time when the Continental Congress was assembled in York, Paine occupied a house on the banks of the Codorus creek which is still standing and is now within the city limits. Mr. C. William Thompson, the eulogist of Paine at this meeting, declared that "steps should be taken to preserve the house in which the distinguished revolutionist once lived, and suggested that the school building to be erected in the Eighth ward should be named in his honor, as there is at present no fitting memorial to Paine."

NOTES AT LARGE.

Of some statements about the relation of religion and architecture by Mr. Ralph Adams Cram of Boston, we read the following in the Catholic Citizen:

"Before an audience of nearly 1,000 invited guests, the leaders in the artistic, educational, social, financial and business world of Pittsburgh, he proceeded to develop the thesis that everything worth while in this world in architecture has been the result of Christian civilization, and by Christian civilization, Mr. Cram lost no time in stating to his startled audience that he meant the Catholic faith, submission to the successor of St. Peter, and a society organized on the basis of Catholic ideals. Architecture, he maintained, is the index of a people's civilization at any stage of its career, and Gothic architecture is the most perfect form of construction devised by the mind of man, and it is the matured flower of Christian civilization. He talked continually of the grace of God, the Sacraments, the Papacy, and the saints, whom he mentioned in an almost endless litany."

Without claiming any knowledge of architecture for ourselves, or questioning the eminence of Mr. Cram, we can see that his statement may be another piece of the same exaggeration or misconception that attributes to Christianity, and especially to Catholic Christianity, all that we have of civilization, whether art, literature, or science properly so called. And yet it is perfectly plain that the handsomest building may be conceived of and erected with neither belief nor knowledge of God, or of sacraments or the papacy. The handsomest building we have ever seen is the Woolworth building, which has no religious motive, and was erected with the profits on the selling of useful articles at 5 and 10 cents each. In the past, of course, as at present, religion and superstition have helped the priests to collect the money.

We do not know whether or not modern architects admit the magnificence of Solomon's temple, which antedates the papacy and the sacraments. If they do Mr. Cram is confuted by the Bible.

We once heard a man declare, as regards architecture and Christianity, that before the church was established there were no buildings above two stories in height. He could never have read the passage at Acts xx, 9: "And there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep; and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep and fell down from the third loft and was taken up dead." If this does not establish the existence of three-story lofts before A. D. 60 then inspiration has misled us, both as to this loft building in Troas, and also about the tower of Babel.

The president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, at last year's meeting, presented fine specimens of architecture in Mediterranean lands that must have been old when Egypt and Babylonia, to say nothing of the most ancient Christian civilizations, with their gods, sacraments and popes, were young. Neither Christianity nor Christian Science could have had any hand in those works that were fifty to one hundred centuries old. The ancient architects built splendid temples to the gods of mythology. They knew nothing of Christ, but doubtless busied themselves with the worship of other demi-gods, whose births were accounted for by the same convenient explanation as his.

The religious inspiration of architects does not stand to reason. We can understand how religion might prompt one man to build a church and another to make a contribution to the expense, but architecture is form, whether displayed in a church or a jail. Across the East river at a point known as Hell Gate there has just been thrown a steel arch-bridge spanning one thousand feet. Religion is absent from the design, execution and purpose, but for the uses of civilization the structure is worth more than both St. Patrick's cathedral and the cathedral of St. John the Divine. We are justified, we think, in setting down Architect Cram's talk as religious rubbish of the familiar kind, which is buncombe.

The dangers an American risks from laws passed to protect his religion and morals are alluded to by George Bernard Shaw, in a letter he has written telling why he cannot incur them by a visit to this country. Says Mr. Shaw:

"If Americans knew anything about America, they would exclude all visitors until they had put their house in order. But I never yet met an American who had any notion of the institutions of his native land beyond a general and mostly erroneous idea that they are glorious. They do not know the risks they are asking me to run when they invite me to cross the Atlantic. They do not know that I should not be allowed to land if I told the truth about my political and religious convictions, or perhaps they never heard of anyone telling the truth about such matters. They do not know that opinions on marriage and the population question would expose me to several years' imprisonment. They do not know that I quite frequently take railway journeys with ladies to whom

I am not married (an abandoned practice common in Europe), and that for this I might in America end my days in a felon's cell. They do not know that in many states the purchase of a smart tie or the accidental protrusion from my pocket of an attractively colored handkerchief (and until the war cut us off from German dyes my ties and handkerchiefs were the stupefaction of London), would consign me to the penitentiary if a policeman detected a lady in the act of admiring them. But I know all these things, and a good many more of the same sort, and they naturally make me nervous. If President Wilson will give me a safe conduct, insuring my return from the lines of American morality, I shall be much more likely to trust myself to the eagle's beak."

Mr. Shaw ridicules the puritanism of America without remembering that it came originally from England, where much of it is still found. A British Comstock society kept the vendors of Paine's "Age of Reason" in jail for many years. The prosecution of Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant on the birth control issue is still remembered. The pursuit of the publishers of the Adult, a British magazine advocating social freedom, had most of the features of the persecution of Moses Harman in America for printing Lucifer. Mr. Shaw would not be able to land here if he confessed himself an Anarchist in politics and a polygamist in religion, but neither would an American be welcomed in Great Britain with that political and religious luggage. He would not get into jail under the Mann act in America unless immorality was proved, but he would risk being blackmailed whether innocent or guilty. Mr. Shaw should know by this time that all governments are built on substantially the same plan, and that most of them license the shrewd to earn an honest livelihood by trading on the mistakes which the indiscreet commit in the pursuit of happiness. That is what originates the vice societies and the laws under which they and kindred bodies flourish. The laws that Mr. Shaw fears were passed in this country, just as in England and elsewhere, to give their framer or his friends the profitable job of prosecuting non-observers. The enforcers are as commercial and venal as the violators.

A morality which does not bear upon life, however ideal it might seem, would not be true. For example, a strained and exaggerated religiosity finds in celibacy the supreme virtue. On this theory a virtuous world would be one which would in a generation cease to be. No abstract doctrine, therefore, could establish the moral value of universal virginity. The cloistral purity which is held up to the imagination in convents is immoral. Kant's precept, "So act that the law of your conduct might become law universal," shows immediately that there is something wrong. If all the world retreated to convents, it would commit euthanasia. However pleasing that might be to the pessimist, it would not be morally good. Nothing can better illustrate the absurdity of an absolute morality. It is not possible to say that anything is good or bad in itself. Everything is good or bad relatively to the agent, the time, the circumstances. Our sole interest in knowing Truth is that it bears upon our lives. If religion, therefore, bears unfavorably on our lives, it is not true. The difference between science and religion is not simply that the one has an a priori demonstration, an abstract and detached authority which the other has not; it is mostly practical. The one tends to make men better, builds up and develops nations, produces nobler life, presents more effective ideals, is the final cause of progress; the other, the false religion, degrades and hinders the life of men, leads to the stagnation and decay of nations, produces lazy, useless, parasitical lives, and presents ideals which lead to corruption, to superstition, to fear and weakness, and paralysis. The practical test will always remain the truest test of everything in this world. It has been proved demonstrably that dogmatic religion does not work, therefore, it is not true—at least not for us of this age, who, from the basis of this solid earth rear our heads into the heavens and assay the starry way, and not like the ancients, posit ourselves among the stars and descend on the earth with corrective formulæ and stage thunder. This latter method is now out of date.

By a proposed amendment to the state constitution of Minnesota, all handling of any sort of intoxicating liquors is prohibited except for "sacramental, medicinal or scientific purposes." The outlook inspires our occasional contributor, Ben Childs of St. Paul, to produce a prose poem, rivaling Walt Mason's best, which is printed in the Pioneer Press and from which we make a quotation, thus:

"Cheer up, despondent rummies and say scat to the glooms; a chance to booze 'forever' upon the prospect looms. What if, for serving wet goods, the barkeep steps aside; both clergyman and doctor will serve you on the side. Just change the sign and lo, no longer in the lurch, to hoist the highballs go to drug store or to church. Cramps or sense of sin need be your only plea to quickly coax a dram from doc or dominie. Booze by any name tastes just as good, say I, from Sweeney's stomach schnapps to sacramental rye. Never mind the brand, it's bound to make you whole; it's good for all that ails you in innards or in soul."

The situation in the District of Columbia, where it is proposed to stop the grog of everybody but ministers and priests, will make the lines of Ben Childs interesting there also.

In view of the much advertised conversion of Horatio Bottomley, editor of John Bull, to Christianity, the comment of the Australian Worker (Sydney) is of interest, to wit:

"The news of Bottomley's conversion will be received with heartfelt thanks by the people who fell in over his wildest 'Northern Territory gold mines,' and the Hansard Union, and others. If war could transmute the base metal of faith into the pure currency of dividends in Horatio's Northern Terrors it would comfort a crowd of weary watchers and solace many broken bank balances."

Bottomley conducts a discreditable newspaper, and does it in a discreditable manner. He has been also a "blue sky" promoter, to the loss of many. He says that except for his conversion he might have been successor of G. W. Foote as editor of the London Freethinker and president of the National Secular Society of England. But he never was worthy to black Foote's shoes, to say nothing of standing in them.

Under the auspices of the National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution) Miss Frances Bates Patterson, formerly a foreign missionary, is campaigning in Pennsylvania against the Mormons. Her appeal is to sectarian prejudice, since Mormonism is a perfectly good religion, as thoroughly Christian as Romanism or Presbyterianism, and if one must have a religion it will answer the purpose as well as another. The National Reform Association twenty years ago was anti-Catholic, but appears to have dropped that fight to take on Mormonism, which has fewer friends. We have read numerous Mormon sermons. They are indistinguishable from those of other Christians, and, being utter punk, as efficacious for salvation as the rest, so far as we can determine.

A Christian is almost an object of ridicule by his friends when they see him reading religious books, but he seldom reads them as they are so infernally dull. Freethought books are anything but dull, but you can not let your orthodox friends see you enjoying yourself unless you are willing to risk making an unpleasant impression. What perfect nonsense all that is! Religion is said to be the most important part of a man's life, but must be considered only from one point of view, and even those who read religious books are unwilling to discuss the various creeds. They think it irreverent, or are embarrassed, and no wonder; for they cannot answer the objections and have an unconscious dread of finding a flaw by thinking too deeply.

"Why do the heathen rage?" inquired God by the mouth of his servant David. The heathen rage today because the Christian nations are breaking the peace of the world, upsetting commercial relations, and destroying the fruits of civilization. An official of China, discussing the millions that his country is to spend for preparedness, says: "It is the misfortune of China that your Christian nations have forced upon us the staggering cost of self-defense." Recently the best heathen of India were announcing prayers for peace among the Christian nations. If facts instead of baseless assertion influenced the world, Christianity would long since have been totally discredited.

The Modern School, the monthly published by the Ferrer Colony at Stelton, N. J., is a model of neat typography, printing and binding, while the contributions are eminently readable. The January number opens with some verse by a young girl, Miss Rose Florence Freeman, entitled "To My Body," which we have read without reaching a decision whether it is a great poem or a howler. The Modern School is a very serious magazine.

Two Catholic newspapers, the New York Free-man's Journal and Der Wanderer of St. Paul, take pride in announcing that they have been denied entrance into Canada. But the exclusion, which THE TRUTH SEEKER has borne for twenty years, is not a matter for congratulation by any newspaper. Violation of freedom of press and mails is regrettable wherever it occurs.

It is doing, not what we would, but as we ought, which changes reluctance into interest, and the sense of futility into the joy of achievement.—Ambrose Shepherd.

An Educative Debate.

The debate held in Shawnee is now history. This debate was well attended and no doubt much good was done, in an educational way, for the workers who attended. The subject of discussion was the Bible, its origin and morality. Joe Warlick, champion debater of the Christian church in the Southwest, affirmed the Bible was a book of divine origin containing a perfect code of morals. Stanley J. Clark, the peerless orator of the Socialists and Free-thinkers, denied the proposition, affirming the counter proposition that the Bible was of human origin and a fallible book.

According to Warlick, Clark was utterly defeated and did not make a single point during the whole debate. It's a measly shame how some of these sky-pilots boast of their ability. If boasting would win a debate Warlick carried away the belt in this one. The truth of the matter is that the preacher stayed as far away from the propositions as he possibly could. The contradictions cited by Clark went unanswered. The immorality taught in the Bible cited by Clark went unnoticed by Warlick. Warlick could not successfully explain why the obscene passages he refused to read in the meetings were contained in the bible. The Freethinker was undoubtedly the victor in this debate.

Some Socialists may wonder what this debate has to do with Socialism. Well, Comrades, it has just this to do with it. When the petty politicians of the old party variety, see their pie-cards in danger of being taken from them by a political victory of the Socialists they get busy and employ some patriotic preacher to get on the platform, and defend "God and our country" and their pie against the advancement of the Infidel and free-love movement of Socialism. The patriotic preacher gets into the harness and, as usual, begins to horn-swoggle the workers by appealing to their religious prejudices, and soon, if nothing is done to counteract, so far as effective work is concerned, the movement is not worth a darn. The only remedy for this is to get someone like Clark to go after these patriotic preachers and show the workers how false, dirty and rotten the religion of Jehovah really is.

The sooner we awake to the fact that orthodox religion is an enemy to the working class movement; a stumbling block to human progress and a travesty on natural truth, economic justice and human happiness, and give it a kick that will send it into the realm of oblivion, the quicker will we gain victory for the cause of the workers. Let's today place anew on the banner of the revolution in bigger and brighter letters than ever before, the words: "No compromise! No surrender! Economic blunders, political sophistry and orthodox superstition must be wiped out of existence."—The Worker, Shawnee, Okla.

A Baptist Disputant.

At last a detailed answer has come to "People vs. the Holy Bible." A Baptist clergyman sends ten pages of manuscript, from which we shall extract some of his criticisms. He calls "Mr. Truth-seeker" "a truth hider" and says that "the Bible is replete with instances of prophecies which have been fulfilled to the very letter, that real 'truth seekers' have to acknowledge are unanswerable evidences that the Holy Scriptures are of God. The very condition today of the Jewish race, his once covenanted people, is a living monument of the truth of holy predictions. . . . Such a man as this is like a son who spits in the face of his father who has fed him and given him every advantage of education and sent him out to fill a noble place among men. Every one must admit, imperfect as our 'Christian nations' are, in customs, laws and fraternity, we are indebted to the ordinances, commandments and precepts for the liberty, justice and security we enjoy. And yet there are such ingrates as this pseudo 'truth seeker' who curses the hand that has blessed them."

He makes some points that appear to be valid objections to the answers of the witnesses, but here are samples of his theological reasoning: "He [Moses] received the Law direct from the Almighty. . . . Some parts he wrote with his own hand . . . while other parts were likely written by an amanuensis." He states that immortality is proved by the verses Gen. xvii, 8; xlviii, 4; xiii, 15; Ex. xxxii, 13; Deut. xii, 28; xxix, 29, which clearly refer only to this earth. "The second chapter (of Gen.) gives a more detailed account of the actual process of man's creation than does the first, but nowhere is there a militancy in the accounts." In referring to Paine, he says: "But unwittingly he shows that because his parents who were 'Shakers' and donned only sombre colors in their raiment, that therefore their religion could not be that of the God of the universe, because he decked the sky and planets with brightness and arrayed flowers and birds in brilliant colors. So far Paine was right in my estimate, but where he erred was in this. If his God was wise and benevolent, as he claimed him to be, why did he not give his poor creatures some revelation of himself besides Nature? Paine was like some others we have met, who having discovered a flaw in the professions of upright men, they cast everything away with the flaw." "The Bible deals with facts, and does not seek to cater to the mock modesty of modern society." It "calls a spade a spade." "God never made a mistake, either in the creation of the devil or men. When we read he 'repented' it is merely to use human sentiment as is often used elsewhere regarding his sadness, grief, his hands, feet, eyes, heart," etc.

In referring to Num. xxxi, 17, he continues: "This seems to us doubtless sheer brutality, and yet Ingersoll when he referred to this instance was reminded of an instance when he was Colonel in the United States army, when he and others undertook to exterminate a tribe of redskins who were inveterate slayers of white settlers on our frontiers." "There is no real difficulty in understanding that 'no man hath seen God,' and yet Jacob said, 'I have seen God face to face.' Jacob had seen an angel who was the representative of God, and hence to him the result was the same as if he had seen God." "Gods, there are many of these; every judge is a god in the Biblical sense. . . . But in the absolute, there is but one true God." He admits the differences in the two genealogies of Christ but explains: "That of Luke is the genealogy of Mary. But as no woman's name figures in Hebrew genealogy, Joseph her husband's name is substituted, as she thus would impart to him her regal claims thereby and also to her son." "The whole thing is the lamest effort to discredit the Bible I have ever read, and I have read many."

The Baptist minister gives us his measure as a critic when he divides the two conflicting genealogies between Mary and Joseph; and gives us a new myth when he quotes Ingersoll as an exterminator of the Indians. The criticism is instructive as showing the benighted condition of some clerical minds.

Willing to Sacrifice His Son.

The Outlook recently published an article on "Why I do not wish my boy to be a minister," and now gives the contrary opinion of a clergyman who is willing to have his son become a minister even though his own experience has been as follows: "After graduating from a prominent non-denominational seminary, I became pastor of a church, and a council was called to examine me preliminary to possible ordination. The stage was set for my downfall; for had I not studied at this particular seminary? . . . From church after church came the reply to myself, as well as to those who tried to gain a hearing for me, that these ministers had kept track of me and were poisoning the minds of the people. . . . I became pastor of a church that could not be scared by their kind . . . But with a change of pastorate and an increase in salary—just over the three figure mark—conditions have not bettered . . . Nevertheless, I wish my boy to become a minister. . . . And I hope that he will enter the ministry because the 'millennium' will not have dawned by the time of his manhood. Men will still be needed in pulpits to bring men to God-consciousness, to interpret the Interpreter of God to men, to interpret life to men. Men will be needed to influence men to become reconciled to the spiritual laws of life, even as they are reconciled to the laws of nature. . . . My own experience has not 'soured' me in regard to the work of the ministry, even if I must shortly take up other work to 'make both ends meet.'"

He is not much more kind to his son than Jehovah was to his children, and his frankness reveals the pettiness of members of the ministry and of their congregations, to which he is willing to submit the fortunes of the young man. A. M.

In an article dealing with various sorts of graft and imposition in the state legislatures, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch quotes the following about Pennsylvania's lawmaking body and the impositions it puts on taxpayers: "At the opening sessions of the legislature chaplains delivered prayers in both House and Senate. Each minister will receive $294 for his prayer, and when the new chaplains are appointed, they will draw pay for three weeks during which they rendered no service. Under this dual system of payment to chaplains, as well as to other clerical help, Pennsylvania taxpayers have to pay high prices for prayers for their lawmakers."

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

IF I WERE A GOD.

From Alba Satterthwaite, New York.
To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

If I were a god I would not permit torrents of iron hail to rip and tear the victims of a senseless war into pieces of palpitating meat, nor permit machines of infernal device to stifle them by choking, poisonous gases, nor permit them to be seared and incinerated by a hellish liquid fire.

If I were a god I would not permit mud and gore-filled trenches to swarm with human creatures moaning and quivering with gangrened wounds, human creatures suffocating with the stench of dead comrades fly-blown and maggot-eaten at their sides, human creatures falling asleep from sheer exhaustion while rats gnaw at their living cheeks and lips.

If I were a god I would not permit brave men to die slowly and painfully in holes in the ground and under trees and in stables and huts and in cottages and school houses, in railroad cars and motor trucks, in churches and hospitals; nor would I permit them to lie in dirt and filth, with sightless eyes rolled up to a heaven of brass and with flies and vermin on their distorted, swollen lips and in their gaping wounds.

If I were a god I would not permit twenty millions of war-maddened men to strive with utmost desperation to kill one another by the use of every deadly weapon which the merciless ingenuity of man has been able to contrive; nor would I permit the destruction of innumerable homes or allow monstrous shambles to make millions of weeping widows and orphan children; neither would I permit a great ship pulsating like a thing alive and loaded with human freight to be suddenly sent to the bottom of an icy sea by the torpedoes of a vindictive and implacable foe.

If I were a god I would not permit a decadent monarchical brain, rotten to the verge of madness, to direct the deportation of scores of thousands of citizens from their native land and their herding by alien bayonets into a white slavery that compels them to aid in making war munitions to be used against their own people; neither would I permit a monstrously cruel twentieth-century Nero to caper and gibber and spit in the face of civilization the while he prates of divine right and heavenly guidance.

If I were a god I would not permit vain and pompous officers to drive courageous troops to sure destruction, nor permit civilians to be driven from their homes, shot down at their thresholds or burned alive in the flames of their own dwellings; nor would I permit aged women to be brained for sheer deviltry or nameless crimes be perpetrated upon young women and children, or let hundreds of thousands of innocent non-combatants perish for lack of food.

If I were a god I would not permit rulers of men to talk of religion and duty to a deity and of devotion to a fatherland and then force their subjects into a welter of mutilation and destruction, nor would I permit putative statesmen so to manipulate governments that their dupes would be willing to engage in bloody warfare for no reason at all.

If I were a god I would not permit ideals to be so twisted and distorted and moral motives so tangled and confused that the minds of men would be warped and perverted and war would seem a grand and glorious emprise.

If I were a god the sullen thunder of the great war's fury would deafen my ears to everything but its horror; the incessant roar of machine guns that spout death every second would stop the pulsation of my heart until the hideous billows of agony ceased to beat upon the shores of existence.

If I were a god I would not create man without his consent and then try to shuffle the responsibility of man's acts upon man instead of on myself; nor would I, as Mark Twain has so well said, mouth of justice and invent a hell, nor frown upon crimes and then commit them all; and if I could make good people instead of bad ones I would not choose to make bad ones, nor if I could make all people happy would I refuse to make any happy.

If I were a god I would not permit millions of children to be cheated of their birthright and immure them for long hours in odious factories where their innocent childhood is sacrificed on the altar of grasping rapacity and cold-blooded greed.

If I were a god I would not permit small boys to toil at the breakers in coal mines and thus have their souls as well as their bodies inevitably dwarfed or crushed.

If I were a god I would not permit a girl of tender years to toil in a foul sweatshop for a wage so pitifully small that she would be constantly tempted to traffic in her own flesh, nor would I permit her to become a pitiable slave in a despicable trade.

If I were a god I would not permit a virulent plague to make helpless cripples of babes, nor would I be indifferent to the sufferings of agonized mothers.

If I were a god I would not permit a thousand of my sincere youthful worshippers to be roasted alive on a burning vessel—would you?

IS THE MICROBE THEORY TRUE?

From David Eccles, Maryland.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Now that the Jesus controversy is about exhausted I am reminded of a plea for information from my whilom adversary, Mr. George Long. In spite of his intention to be strictly serious, he is still funny. This grotesqueness is the penalty he pays for inattention; for had he paid attention to what has been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, he would have found all the information desired and would not, for the fourth or fifth time, have repeated the blunder that the microbe theory of development is opposed to Darwin's theory of Natural Selection.

As he has raised a question that may prove of general interest, a brief review may be acceptable to the editor.

Once for all, let me again state that the microbe theory is complementary to, and in no sense antagonistic to Darwin's theory. It is the theory of natural selection more deeply applied than Darwin knew how. The microbe theory of disease was only beginning to be suspected as true in Darwin's day. Dr. R. G. Eccles, as a practical physician, chemist, and biologist, when the facts of anaphylaxis, and precipitins were slowly being developed by the labors of Theobald Smith, Kitasato, Roseneau, Flexnor, and others, some twelve or fifteen years ago, at once saw their biological bearing, and developed the theory that the physiology of the entire organic world was built up as a chemical fortress and battery against the intrusion of bacterial parasites. I delivered the first lecture ever made on the subject, and called the theory "The New Darwinism"; and this lecture appeared under that head in THE TRUTH SEEKER about seven years ago.

It is a proved fact that microbes disturb the chemistry of the system, and often render spermatozoa or ova sterile. No other cause is known to work so universally. Dr. Eccles found in the intrusion of foreign germ proteins which are always poisonous, the cause of sterility among hybrids from distinct species; a fact that puzzled Darwin and Huxley. Heat, radium emanations, poisons, etc., will also act to effect changes in the germ plasm. Professors Loeb, Stockard, Bardeen and the Hertwigs have shown what curious monstrosities can be thus produced. A few of these have proved to be mutants, that remained permanent species and reproduced their own kind; but this is rare. The laws of mutation are yet to be discovered. In recent years Mendelism and the mutation theory of development have sought to supplant Darwinism, relegating the doctrine of Natural Selection to a subordinate place. The microbe theory of variation completely restores and vindicates Darwinism, by showing that selection extends to molecules and atoms, and explains mutation and orthogenesis on a chemical basis.

The condition of hairlessness, which is specially enquired after, is only one among millions of changes effected by parasites. Organic nature is a standing proof of this. The progressive change from germ to soma cells as multicellular organisms increased; the retirement of the germ cells to secluded parts of the system; the chemistry of the tissue, as proved by precipitins when foreign proteins are introduced into the blood; the wonderful coagulation of the blood itself when exposed to the air; the secretions and selective actions of stomach intestines, and glands; the impervious and indigestible coverings of insects; the calcareous jackets of shell fish; the hair, fur, feathers, etc., of birds and animals, etc., have no other explanation than slowly selected adaptations against the eternal proliferation of the microbe world, correlated with the physiological uses to the species.

Bacterial life as a total now covers an illimitable field. They have likewise varied to meet new poisonous changes in their hosts. As time rolled on, and adaptation became heaped on adaptation, the field of the single species became more and more restricted. This is the "discriminative" feature that Mr. Long wonders at. Every organ in the body has now its own special parasite. It can exist nowhere else. It will discriminate in attacking particular men, particular animals, and particular parts of animals. It may attack the face and no device could allure it to attack the leg or breast. There are microbes that will attack the germ cells and no other part. They have none of his psychology as to modesty, however. If they refrain from attacking the pubes among the Caucasian race, some condition of chemistry determines the repulsion. When the head becomes bald a similar discrimination is visible. They prefer starting on the crown, and vary all the way from denuding a small portion to complete baldness. Sometimes a tuft is left in front, and generally a fringe around the ears and neck. The microbes that exhibit these freak tastes have been caught, raised in cultures, and tested as to their powers; so there is no guesses as to what produces these results. In barber's itch and ringworm certain parts of the skin are attacked and the rest of the body left untouched.

Some years ago, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I called the attention of a Lamarkian critic of mine, who thought wearing clothes was the cause of man's denuded condition, to the fact that savage races that never wore clothes were generally the least hairy. Still there are exceptions. The Ainu, a primitive race of Japan; the Todas of India, and the original natives of Australia are all hairy, the latter exceedingly so. Some mountainous tribes of Africa are also hairy. In all races, white or black, savage or civilized, between the fourth and eighth month of development, the human foetus is covered with hair, face and all. According to the principle of biological recapitulation this lanuga hair represents the past condition of the race. In the fish and amphibian stage there was no hair. In the mammalian stage the body was covered with hair. At the very dawn of the human stage the hair began to disappear. Darwin attributes its disappearance to sexual selection; Wallace to the predetermination of God; for, as a matter of animal adaptation, he looked upon it as a positive loss.

In most, and perhaps in all hairy animals, the soles of the feet are hairless. In the quadrupeds the palms of the hands are always hairless. Sexual selection could have nothing to do with this. The cause that operated to produce this change will account for all hairless in man or beast. The mammoths and elephants found embedded in the glaciers of the polar regions are exceedingly hairy. Those now extant living in warm, moist regions are almost hairless. The rhinoceros is another such case. In past geological times it was hairy. When, like the elephant, it betook itself to warmer regions and sought the cooling effects of rivers and lakes to abate the heat, it too, lost its hair. The whales, dugongs, dolphins, etc., are other examples. Paleontologists have traced them to the Zeuglodonts that once inhabited Africa. The latter no longer exist; but we are told they were hairy carnivorous animals. When they took to the seas they lost their hair. Fishes are cold-blooded; these are warm-blooded animals, and breathe air. All hairless dogs come from warm, moist regions. A common cause is at work. What is it? Not sexual selection. Not the wearing of clothing. Not the water itself; for seals, walrus and sea lions that frequent the northern sea still retain their hair. Dr. Eccles says warmth and moisture bereft them of hair through parasitic action. Some exanthematous disease was so severe as to effect the germ plasma and some variations turning in the direction of less hairiness proved a life preserver and were perpetuated by natural selection. That, to my mind, is the most rational answer yet offered. The soles of animals' feet and the palms of the quadrupeds are most exposed to injury by thorns and the sharp edges of stones, hence most exposed to infection. They were the first to change to nakedness. Till something causes a chemical change in the germ there is no variation. Keep that in mind. Without variation there is nothing for natural selection to act upon. Natural selection is simply the scythe of death cutting off the unfit. The organism that cannot resist disease is fated.

Hair always falls out in acute fevers, when the temperature runs high. Not only the hair but the epidermis is shed. The loss of skin must have been, at some stage in man's career, as he was then situated, an adaptation. New diseases when they appear always act with greatest severity. We now only see the last of their ever-weakening attacks. Local hair diseases were also effective. Early cave dwelling women were more subject to attack than men through nursing the sick, and so we find them universally less hairy than men. Sexual selection, after man became accustomed to the hairless condition, may have tended to complete what nature had begun; but it cannot account for the beginning. The cell lineage of different parts of the body has a different history and origin, and the oldest cell lineage of the individual when developing from the ovum would be less likely to suffer from shortage of hair-producing chromatin than the later appearing cell lines. The head would be quicker to dry after exposure than other parts of the body. There are always a number of conditions peculiar to infection that show unexplainable vagaries. Why some men or animals develop in one way and others in a different way, will always more or less baffle the reason. We are safe, however, in clinging to the general law; assured that fuller knowledge will finally explain apparent exceptions and peculiarities. Heritage resides in atomic structure, and the only thing that will explain heritage will be the law that discloses how that structure came to be. The microbe theory of chemical variation in organism is the best yet offered. Natural selection accounts for all the rest, without the intermeddling of the Gods.

PAINE MEETING IN COLUMBUS. From O. C. Weatherby, Columbus, O.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In reporting to you upon our Paine banquet last year we said: "Next year we shall hold another and larger memorial in Columbus." Monday evening, the 29th, at the Chittenden Hotel we kept our promise, for almost twice as many persons as were present last year sat down to dinner, 130 or more being present.

Mr. Douglas Kirkling, first vice-president and one of the founders of the society, acted as toastmaster, while seven or eight good speakers portrayed the life and work of Paine in a very creditable manner. Mr. Hugh Huntington, secretary of the Sons of the American Revolution here, and recently a candidate for Congress on the Republican ticket, said that they had held a banquet not long ago in honor of Benjamin Franklin when only 30 persons were present. If numbers count for anything, therefore, Thomas Paine is about four times as popular in Columbus as Benjamin Franklin. Last year two preachers attended our banquet; this year we had three. These three, of course, were of the more liberal denominations and might be styled, as one of them said, "good heretics." The event was a brilliant success and it was an inspiration to all Columbus Rationalists to push forward with renewed energy.

We were annoyed as usual by the tactics of the "meek followers of the lowly Jesus," being brought to bear upon the manager of the hotel to make him revoke his contract with us, while our four religiously-muzzled newspapers practically ignored the event, two giving us but brief, incorrect reports and the other two saying nothing at all. These annoyances are also an inspiration to greater rationalistic activities and on that account were a benefit rather than a hindrance.

At the close of the banquet we presented copies of the Age of Reason to all who had not read it (and quite a few hadn't), thus sowing the seed for more rationalism and bestowing additional honor upon him who said: "The world is my country; and to do good is my religion."

Next year we shall hold another and larger memorial in Columbus.

CREATION OR EVOLUTION.

From Atwood Manville, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

According to the Bible record, the world was created in six days, but some have been dissatisfied with the length of time devoted to such a trivial task and have agreed with Dr. Lightfoot of Cambridge University, who in the seventeenth century, wrote, "this work took place and man was created by the Trinity on October 23d, 4004 B. C., at nine o'clock in the morning." More recently, scientific theologians have been dissatisfied with the short time assigned to the creation, and have explained that each "day" was a cycle of years, and that the Biblical account was confirmed by science. The majority of scientists and theologians now agree that the theory of direct creation has gone forever, but they are not all convinced that the theory of evolution is correct as usually understood.

It is rather disturbing to the believers in evolution to find that ethnologists trace the origin of all mankind back to "the cradle of humanity." In the fascinating book, "Bible Myths," and elsewhere, the presence of man on the western hemisphere is accounted for by a migration across the Isthmus where Behring Straits are now open, and the great similarity in religious beliefs found in Mexico and India is part of the evidence that warrants this assumption. Africa could easily have been populated in the same way, and as the British Isles were inhabited by Europeans and Europe obtained its civilization from Asia, the Garden of Eden assumes very important proportions.

The separated continents have their own species of plant and animal life, and it might be supposed that man could have been evolved on one continent as well as on another, for climatic conditions are somewhat similar. Is the proper explanation found in the theory that the portion of the world where man was first established was the part that first became sufficiently advanced for that development, or may it not be that man developed in all parts of the world at approximately the same time?

PRAGMATISM.

From Norman Murray, Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I read twice over with a good deal of interest Mr. Manville's article and the Editor's comment on it in your issue of the 27th ult.

All sensible people are always learning, and when one gets into a rut and makes a fad of any one idea, he becomes a bore. This class of people are not confined to religious fanatics. I think we could easily find some of them among those calling themselves Free-thinkers. The experience of journalists, as well as storekeepers, now is that the more variety the better. Nothing takes with the public better than a good, live controversy. I had one with a Mr. Whately in THE TRUTH SEEKER some years ago which created a good deal of interest.

I have only one fault to find with THE TRUTH SEEKER and that is its persistent personal attacks on the clergy. I have been for forty years in close contact with the clergy of various denominations before I left the church for good, and twenty years outside it carrying on a very active propaganda at times and my experience has been that ignorant laymen are a much more intolerable nuisance than the clergy. The religious syndicates of all denominations since the beginning of the great Christian superstition have always selected the best types of the population, male and female, as their special agents, and in Roman Catholic communities this policy had disastrous results on the community, as the lower types reproduced their species while the higher types were devoted to celibacy.

The Editor in his remarks on the article referred to said, that "if there should happen to be one (idea) wandering about with no place to express itself we should like to have it reported to us." Now here is an idea, and a very important and interesting one, in which I am very much interested but which so far got a very cold reception among a certain class of people calling themselves Free-thinkers. Now, to me "Pragmatism" is the real genuine free-thought.

Not very long ago a Catholic friend of mine met me on the street and said he was looking for me, as he wanted to give me an invitation to a lecture on Catholic apologetics. I told him it would be no more use to me than the fifth wheel of a coach, but if it was of any use to him, I would fight any one who tried to keep him from getting it.

This is "Pragmatism." Some time ago a good Roman Catholic friend of mine died in Montreal. He was a genuine Highlander of the old type, and as true as steel to his friends. He spoke Gaelic as well as myself. I was the second chief mourner, attended the family council and voted for masses for him just as he would have it if he were living. To me it was all folly, as Erasmus called it, but he believed in it, therefore he had a right to it.

This friend of mine gave me a very interesting idea; "You Free-thinkers," he said, "are very religious, you are always talking about religion, though you are talking against it. Makes no difference, you are very religious. Those who are not religious never take any interest at all in it." This is Pragmatism.

PERPLEXED.

From J. Danforth Taylor, M.D., Mass.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The new Massachusetts income tax law is now on the tongues of all the people. "When in doubt," said B. Sunday, while in Boston, "find out what Jesus would do." So I take my Bible and read Matthew xvii, 24 to 27 and find that Jesus "beat" his taxes in the following manner: He sent his man Friday, who happened to be Peter (on whom the great Christian church was built), to catch a fish, open the fish's mouth, and take out the money he found in the fish's mouth and pay the taxes. Now the question is, shall I go down to the end of a wharf and try my luck or had I better pay up? Another question, did Jesus here anticipate the non-taxation of churches. If I try to follow what Jesus commanded, will I get arrested for trespassing on a private wharf and fishing without a license or if I catch no fish or none with money in his mouth, shall I be fined by the tax commissioner for evading the tax?

I'm a first class fisherman, but when it comes to catching a fish with money in its mouth, my faith grows weak. Question, what would Jesus do in 1917 to pay his tax?

A WORD OF APPROVAL FOR DR. KERSHNER.

From Inquirer, Colorado.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The subjoined paragraph is not taken from the writings of some eminent writer on Freethought, but was actually clipped from the editorial columns of the Christian Evangelist, one of the ablest and most progressive religious papers in the West, edited by the Rev. Dr. F. D. Kershner, some time president of Texas Christian University. Some of Dr. Kershner's Campbellite brethren have for some time past had a habit of clearing their throats whenever his name has been mentioned, but I beg enough of your valuable space in which to tender to him a slight expression of my admiration for his sound Americanism no less than his ripe scholarship and progressive views. Without a spark of malice, however, I would like to ask Dr. Kershner whether he believes the average preacher is any more liberal in his treatment of heretics than the general run of priests? How about some of our odious "Sunday Observance" statutes?

Dr. Kershner said: "From the earliest dawning of history there have been three great castes among nations: the nobility, the warriors and the priests. Thomas Jefferson and the American fathers determined to wipe out all three of them in the New World, and it is to their everlasting credit that the job was well done. The man who tries to build up any one of these types of caste in America is at heart opposed to the foundation principles of this republic."

AN UNPOPULAR PRAYER.

From H. McCarroll, Alberta, Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In Calgary, our neighboring city, there is an exciting contest on among the Presbyterians. Dr. Fulton, pastor of Knox Church, was expelled for making this prayer: "O Lord! We pray Thee for all our people, for the poor rum-soaked Britons and for Canada, even Canada, with all its graft."

The congregation had three four-hour meetings and at the last it was decided thus: "Even though Dr. Fulton's statement is true, as we admit it to be, still our British blood can't stand it at this time, and we hereby accept Dr. Fulton's resignation."

The Merry Girl and the Parson.—Edith was light-hearted and merry over everything. Nothing appealed to her seriously. So one day her mother decided to invite a very serious young parson to dinner and he was placed next to the light-hearted girl. The Canadian Magazine relates that everything went well until she asked him: "You speak of everyone having a mission. What is yours?" "My mission," said the parson, "is to save young men." "Good!" replied the girl, "I'm glad to meet you. I wish you'd save one for me."

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Peter Cooper, February 12, 1791-April 4, 1883.

This, perhaps the best known American philanthropist, was born in New York city Feb. 12, 1791. He came from an old American family, his father having been a soldier in the Revolution. He was the fifth in a family of nine children. His education was neglected and he was early compelled to work at hat making, brick making and brewing. Finally he was apprenticed to a coach maker. His first financial success was the purchase of the sole right of selling a cloth shearing machine for the state of New York. Business becoming dull after the War of 1812, he went into the furniture business, and afterwards the grocery business on the site of the present Bible house. His next venture was a great success—a glue and isinglass factory—situated where the Park Avenue hotel now stands. The foundation of his great fortune, however, was the Canton Iron Works in Baltimore, Maryland, which he erected in 1828. Railroads had been planned, but were yet to be put to a practical test. Engines so far proposed had proved unsatisfactory. In 1830 Mr. Cooper designed and built a locomotive which, though small, being only the size of a modern hand car, was a success. It was called the "Tom Thumb." Among other inventions in which Mr. Cooper interested himself was, in 1854, the first manufacture of iron structural beams, and the first trial of the Bessemer process in America in 1856. He erected large foundries to advance the iron industry in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. He was interested with Cyrus W. Field in laying the first Atlantic cable and with Samuel F. B. Morse in perfecting the first telegraph; was president both of the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Co. and the North American Telegraph Co. His advances of cash made these great inventions possible. But he was interested in other matters not of a commercial nature. In the 1830's and '40's, when the Roman Catholic church demanded a division of the public school funds, Mr. Cooper strenuously opposed them. As a leader of the Free School society, he was the means of having a state law passed in 1842 forbidding the use of public funds for the support of any "religious sectarian doctrine." He advocated the manumission of the slaves and was a warm supporter of President Lincoln during the great civil war. In 1876, being then eighty-five years old, Mr. Cooper was called upon to act as the standard bearer of the Greenback party and polled 81,740 votes. His greatest act and the one by which he is best known was the establishment of Cooper Union "forever devoted to the advancement of science and art, in their application to the varied and useful purposes of life." Many other endowments have been made for this institution, Andrew Carnegie putting it on a solid financial basis in 1900 by a gift of $600,000. Chief among its features is a large hall dedicated forever to free speech.

Mr. Cooper was a Freethinker, often calling himself "an old heretic." He graciously accepted from the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER a copy of Thomas Paine's Works for the library of the Union. When he died, on April 4, 1883, at the age of ninety-two, he was buried from the All Souls' Unitarian church.

In 1874, at a reception given in his honor he uttered these words, well worthy of repetition:

"Measured by the achievements of the years I have seen, I am one of the oldest men who have ever lived, but I do not feel old and I propose to give you the receipt by which I have preserved my youth. I have always given a welcome to new ideas, and I have endeavored not to feel too old to learn; and this, though I stand here with the snow of so many winters upon my head, my faith in human nature, my belief in the progress of man to a better social condition, and especially my trust in the ability of men to establish and maintain self-government, are as fresh and as young as when I began to travel the path of life."

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

When first George Washington began To bear the burdens of a man,
He didn't know that he possessed A mind more brilliant than the rest;
He had no more idea than you Of just how much his hands could do.
He could not look ahead and see The hero he was going to be.
When problems came he buckled in And always did his best to win.

There might have been a thousand men Who knew as much as George back then,
A thousand men with strength as great, And wise enough to rule the state;
But they were timid and afraid, And failure's chances gravely weighed.
They would have gladly led the fight With certain victory in sight,
But grim disaster loomed up large And so they never led a charge.

Today is just the same as then:
The world still cries aloud for men;
Not men of brilliancy alone,
Or men that merely muscle own,
But men like Washington to fight For principles of truth and right,
Who seek success, but do not quail Because they may be doomed to fail,
Nor ask before they buckle in To know that they are sure to win.

The men whose names shall never die Are always bold enough to try.

—Edgar A. Guest, in the American Boy.

Feat of a West Virginia Hunter.

Here is a hunting "yarn" that used to be told back in the hills of West Virginia, says the Youth's Companion.

A young hunter went up into the hills to "try his luck." There was one "point" in the hills almost perfectly round and the soil was so loose and dry that it was easily marked by the feet of a passing animal. The hunter saw turkey tracks the moment he had reached the point, and followed them. They circled and recircled the point, and still no turkey appeared. The tracks were fresh, too.

"There's only one thing about it! That turkey just watches my tracks and keeps following just in back of me," thought the young man. Accordingly he took off his shoes, put them on backward, and so went round the point and got the baffled turkey!

Story of the Rocks and Hills.

You do not need to be a geologist to understand and enjoy the wonder tales of the rocks. The simplest A B C of science will suffice. You need learn no technical terms or concern yourself about any details of geologic knowledge. All you really have to do is just to remember that seas have flowed where hills now stand, and that the rocks you see were once sandy beaches and sea floors, which were pressed and hardened into stone and afterward lifted up by the tremendous pressures resulting from the shrinking of the crust of the earth upon its cooling nucleus.

In the landscape, as you fly by, is the very substance of those old sea bottoms and beaches now swelled up in hills and rocky knolls. You will perceive that the rocks are in layers or strata, one above another, strangely twisted in places. These layers come out very plain to view when bare of shrubs and mosses and unblanketed with snow. Sometimes bright, crinkling lines of ice or little ledges of snow lodged out of the reach of the sunshine, make plainer the divisions of the strata, like the streaks of white paper between the lines of type.

Except for their picturesqueness, these rocks and ledges are commonplace enough to those who see them without understanding their sign-language. Hundreds of thousands of passers-by in the whirling trains have glanced indifferently at them and taken no second look—unless they happened to catch sight of a goat or a dog perched on a giant rock.

Yet all the books that were ever printed contain less history than is there plainly displayed.

It is the Book of Chronicles of the Earth, the World's Bible, that stands open. It is absurd, it is humiliating, in this age of supposed universal learning and sharpened intelligence, that whole trainfuls of "educated" people should see these things and not notice them, never say a word about them, but only talk of stocks or bonds or dresses or the latest dancing step or bury nose and brains in a novel while Historic Time, the oldest and greatest of kinetographers, is running reel after reel of the picture drama of Creation in an endless panorama before them.

Perhaps you have stood looking at those astonishing sections of the great sequoia trees of California, twenty or thirty feet in diameter, fastened up on the walls of the American Museum of Natural History, and have counted with a thrill, almost of awe, the circles of annual growth lines, which show that those trees were a thousand or two thousand years expanding their mighty trunks in the sunshine of past centuries before tempests and lightnings overthrew them.

But how much vaster the interest that is offered by the lines of growth of our continent and of the earth itself, which you can see in the upheaved bottoms of vanished seas, that were turned into rocky layers and then puffed and rolled up into hills and mountains millions of years ago! They need no halls to display them; the landscape is their museum.

Compressed into a rocky layer, a few feet in thickness, there may be the product of uncounted eons of depositions, slowly formed at the bottom of a primeval sea, into which rivers, that the changed earth has forgotten, flowed down from mountains which were crumbled into sand so long ago that the sun himself may then have been a star of a different color.

Did you ever know that half the Hudson river was drowned by the ocean ages ago and that, when you sail out of the harbor that it has formed for the greatness of New York, its submerged and sand-silenced valley still runs beneath you, a trench in the sea-floor, which, off the Navesink Highlands, lies 800 feet below the level of the tide that heaves your ship? It is a great mistake to think that the earth was not an interesting place before Adam and Eve came to live on it.—Garret P. Serviss.

"Sacred Things."

There is a little story worth repeating. The former head of a large private school in Detroit was a gentleman of dignified bearing, refined, and correct always in manner and speech. By birth and early raising he was a Vermonter, and doubtless of straight Puritan extraction.

One day in his boyhood his mother called him in from the yard, where he was playing with other boys, to say to him in a tone of mingled sadness and severity:

"Charles, my son, I never thought to hear you use a swear word!"

"Why, mother," said the boy, "I didn't use any swear word. I only said 'the devil.' Nobody thinks that's swearing."

"I don't care," replied the mother, quickly, "it's making light of sacred things, and you must not do so again."

Real Penalty.—"I have come here," said the angry man to the superintendent of the street-car line, "to get justice; justice, sir. Yesterday, as my wife was getting off one of your cars, the conductor stepped on her dress and tore a yard of frilling off the skirt."

The superintendent remained cool.

"Well, sir," he said, "I don't know that we are to blame for that. What do you expect us to do? Get her a new dress?"

"No, sir. I do not intend to let you off so easily as that," the other man replied gruffly. He brandished in his right hand a small piece of silk.

"What I propose to have you do," he said, "is to match this silk."—New York Times.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

WM. PETERSON, Washington.—No government statistics on how big a percentage of the inmates of our lunatic asylums have become insane through religion have been published or compiled. The number is known to be large, and appears to be increasing.

A. W. LEVER, Philadelphia.—We believe in Universal Harmony, and pine for it, but no such realization is possible while there are so many superstitions conflicting with and preferred to science and truth. It was like meeting an old acquaintance to get your letter and the one signed by your name appearing in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of Jan. 29.

B. L. M., Milwaukee.—See Matt. v, 28; also verse 29, in connection wherewith read likewise and compare Matt. xix, 12. This is the best of all moral codes, and all infractions of it should be prosecuted under the federal statutes affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States! Have you noticed how quickly some persons begin to drip at the chops when you suggest a rational consideration of moral problems?

J. D. JOHNSON, Michigan.—The Armageddon you hear so much about is mentioned in Rev. xvi, 16. It is the same word as Megiddo, found in Josh. xii and xvii; Judg. i and v; 1 Kings iv and ix; 2 Kings ix and xxiii; 1 Chron. vii; 2 Chron. xxxv, and Zech. xii. You will see that the battle is a past event, and the occurrence of the name at Rev. xvi, 16, has been taken to denote that the book of Revelation, of unknown authorship, is an ancient Jewish apocalypse. The persons now speaking of Armageddon as something yet to come are humbugs.

B. A., Montclair, N. J.—No, we have not as yet abandoned our attitude of neutrality. We are waiting for our compatriot, George Seibel of Pittsburgh, who has dictated the position of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the beginning of the war, to say the word that will release us from a divided allegiance. Our German friend in Washington Market assures us that the situation is not serious so long as the U. S. has only stationed soldiers on the bridges and fortifications. "But wait," he says, "until they put a guard around the breweries."

GEO. F. G. MORGAN, M.D., California.—Perhaps our correspondent Dr. Wakeman Ryno, who holds that the Bible is an almanac, would be interested in discussing with you the theory that the Christian and Hebrew scriptures are a cipher code, or books of the Sibyls and Houris. These books impress us as being a literary jumble, having no particular character or discoverable original design; hence when they are called a cipher or an almanac or anything except what they appear to be on their face, a collection of ancient literature, religious, historical, mystic and poetical, we need to be shown.

J. W. F. COPENHEAVER, Pennsylvania.—While the assertion by some TRUTH SEEKER correspondents of their belief in Spiritualism is distasteful to you, you have to admit that less of the doctrine appears now than formerly. We cannot ignore the services of the Spiritualists in not only promoting Freethought but in supporting this paper. Some of the old-timers are still with us, as for example J. R. Perry of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., but in the course of evolution the majority have gone over to the religionists, with whom they harmonize more than with Materialists. We have seen some manifestations of spiritualism, or what are called phenomena, but having no prior belief in continuance after death we never attributed any of them to discarnate intelligences. The belief in such existences is older than Spiritualism, and for that reason was adopted to explain its phenomena, by whatever method produced.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

A Different View of Woman.

Mary Monico once more breaks loose in a diatribe against her sex and seems to be cock-sure that she has clinched the argument as to the inferiority of her sex. Well, if she believes as she writes, I must state that if an individual is suffering from mistaken ideas, obsessions and general incompetency as to scientific data, facts and mistaken historical conceptions, she is one!

Her attempts to show that woman is physically inferior to man are but pure abstractions. In remote times she was the physical equal of man. A North American Indian chief said to Hearne: Women are created for labor; a woman can carry or drag as much as two men. The Papuan women of New Guinea are more strongly built than the men, states a well-known ethnologist. In Cuba the women fought shoulder to shoulder with the men. Among the tribes in India, as well as the Pueblos of North and the Patagonians of South America, the women are as tall as the men, not to mention other tribes; and among the Russians, the sexes are more alike than is the case among the western Europeans. Accordingly, in all parts of the earth there are instances of equal or approximately equal physical development.

When agriculture became the pursuit of early man, woman was left this task while man took to the hunt, developing skill in the arts and use of the weapon, and finally became the master and woman the slave. Later on man became the slave, and finally was freed through the force of economic conditions; and finally having possessed himself of the tools of production, gained economic control and remained the master. This is true today. The privileged interests are now in control of the military class, which keeps the masses in subjection. Remove this weapon from the controlling classes, and economic slavery would disappear very rapidly.

If Mary Monico is familiar with economics and their influence in the development of the social life of the race, I fail to discern it in her arguments. This question cannot be settled without taking into account the social, economic, religious and ethnological evolution of man.

She dwells upon the sexual as an element which prohibits any advancement being made by the female. Her sexual function makes her physically weaker, mentally weaker, and I am unable to think of any other weak points woman possesses.

The sex arguments are mere abstract statements. Take the statement: "The feminization of the race is synonymous with the emasculation of the race," which displays unfamiliarity with sex, its functions and psychology. It appears to me that women are nearly emasculated at the present day in so far as sex function is concerned, and this due to our ignorance of things sexual, developed in us through the ideas of modesty and shame, sanctioned by the church, the state, custom and superstition. In a private lecture before a mixed audience I dwelt on this phase of the sexual life of woman, and I state right here that Mary Monico's views on sex are in utter variance with the opinions of sex psychologists. I take it that THE TRUTH SEEKER columns are not open to discussions on pure sex psychology; at least I fear that the perverted Mr. Sumner might confiscate the issue and brew up trouble for friend Macdonald.

As to the statement that woman thinks far less on sexual matters than man and so is purer in mind than man, is a question. Among the suffragists whom I know, I am certain that this argument is not brought forth. The only public argument on sex purity that is brought out is the protest against the double standard of morals; and these women whom I know are quite tolerant in sex discussion, and I assure you are neither modest nor immodest. Further, the attack on the claim of the suffragists that woman possesses greater integrity of character, is more moral, and that they will purify and elevate society or the political life, etc., is not refuted by taking female characters out of history, exploiting their foibles, their frivolities, whims, et cetera. These characters are made to represent woman in the past, present and future. One can take female characters from past history and show that woman is the embodiment of all the virtues and wisdom possessed by the race. There is no logic in this style of argument.

It is true that the morality of women is superior to that of the men, and how can it be otherwise? If women had reigned supreme in the beginning and up till today, the tale would be reversed and man would have been the moral biped. The question of the superior morals of the female over male morality cannot be settled by the purely historical method; statistically it may, and I suggest that the critic try this method. Morality to the anarchist, to the determinist, is not a matter of sex, and how can one whom I believe to be a Rationalist and sometimes an anarchist argue from any other viewpoint? The anarchist position states morality is based upon the protection of the sacred rights of property. The determinist position states that the individual is a product of his entire past ancestry and his environment, and has no free will. It is true that woman in the past has produced but a few great characters as compared with man, and this because of her subjection. But this does not constitute an argument that great women will not be produced in the future proportionately with great men. Custom, social sanction, and the sex barrier persists in making the female, as soon as she is born, distinctly feminine, and how can it help being otherwise? Let us try the experiment of taking a group of young females and raising and educating them as the male is educated, and the product will be masculine as masculine standards go.

Woman contributors to the Encyclopedia Britannica are by no means a small number and have contributed towards such subjects as medicine, art, astronomy, language, painting, philology and general science. Every month in the field of chemistry I note articles by women on pure chemistry; and she is coming to the fore in other branches every year. I make this broad claim that there are more women engaged in scientific work today since she won her right to education than there were men engaged in scientific pursuits during a similar period in the progress of the sciences.

"But give us education, and then see!" is their incessant cry. To which suffragist argument Mary Monico replies: "The men of today are more highly educated, more broadly educated than the men of bygone centuries, and yet we see in him the very traits that characterized, the very motives that actuated his grandfather." I don't admit this, for I am no more like my grandfather than a peach is like a walnut. I deny Mendelian inheritance to social characters. Yet surely there has been some advance made; even Emma Goldman will admit this. And again, if no advance has been made, how comes it that we have come out of feudalism? If motives remain constant there can be no change. Once more concerning modesty. "Listen to the conversations of women among themselves, about the most private sex matters." Women do not monopolize discussions of the erotic, and the men are notorious in this monopoly. It appears to me that modesty in the sexes is about evenly divided.

Now as to the challenge: "Give me one woman writer, one woman musician, one woman painter, one woman scientist, one woman inventor, one woman financier, one woman philanthropist, who nearly approach any of all these benefactors that man can produce, and what success they did attain was not attained through an incentive of love, of hate, of desire for publicity, of money, but solely through the abstract desire for truth that actuated Spinoza, Bruno, Ingersoll, etc." These three notables were philosophers, and it is an erroneous comparison. But as this challenge is addressed to "Madame," I will not take up this argument. Suffice it that I know of no notable female musician; the others can be supplied in plural numbers, and six-sevenths of the challenge rendered worthless.

NOTES ON THE MARRIAGE TIE.

Under the heading "Religion and Morals," Mr. Cyrus H. Eshelman says that he would shun a man who looked lightly on the marriage ideal as he would a sewer or a venomous reptile. He perhaps forgets that society calls the woman immoral who sacrifices her virtue under the same condition that a married woman gratifies her natural instincts. One is allowable under the statutes, the other is not. Now tell me, if you can, which is the purer from a spiritual standpoint—if there is such a thing as spirituality—the unmarried licentious female or the libidinous married one? Let us lay aside customary sentiment about wife, mother, sister and that old worn-out moth-eaten gag, "insult to womanhood," and express ourselves from a rational and honest basis.

I shall add here that the marriage tie is neither sacred nor a sacrament. It is merely a man-made institution with ceremony, giving man and woman a certain license. The only beautiful result of this nuptial bargain is the child for mother and father to center their lives upon. And remember this, a child born out of wedlock is just as legitimate in the sight of God—Nature, if you please—as a child born under the hymeneal bond; and this truth is in spite of the biblical injunction that an illegitimate child cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.

In saying that there is no purity among women, I do not mean to include innocent girls or continent unmarried women, but I include all in strenuous courtship, in honeymoon and in regular married life.

Now as to the double standard of morals, I must coincide with a noted philosopher who said in substance: "They could long ago have had a single standard of morals if they had stuck together and demanded it, but the legalized mistresses never desired it nor advocated it; they are satisfied to sell themselves in wedlock to get their care and keep from some man, the same as the unlicensed do in the open market. And so they elevate their heads, and look with contempt on unmarried women who pursue pleasure exactly as they do."

I am not expounding these irrefutable truths with disrespect, but simply to expose the sham and pretense of society with its so-called chastity, its unjust economic system and its pagan religions. What a colossal false alarm society really is!

E. E. KUSEL.

THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY.

The Bryanite Peace Foundation.

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." On these few words stand or fall the pillars of that much vaunted structure that should civilize the world, and bring peace and healing to the nations—the Christian philosophy.

That philosophy has been harped upon by the harpers, and borne upon the wings of angels for close upon 2,000 years. That is still being lauded and caressed by the Bryanites and Sundayites as "the only solid foundation upon which the peace of the world can be lastingly built"; and whose money-getting advocates and harpers are, according to their own opinions, the only ones who can bring about a consummation so devoutly to be wished.

That philosophy, which has ever since its initiation by its little band of founders who, by its own morbid and emaciated revolutionary teachings, were themselves divided and brought to ceaseless strife by the bigotry of its own belligerency, right through its steering into and blending with the civic and ecclesiastic forces of a Roman paganism which embraced a world; up through its subdivision into hundreds of mongrel sects, till ultimately shorn by science of its boasted power against which even the gates of hell should not prevail.

That philosophy, upon whose foundation only a lasting structure can be built, upon whose summit the dove of peace can rest its feet and fold its tired wing, after 2,000 years of weary flight; what though Rome in its palmy days sheltered a hundred religions side by side in peace, extending to each other the mutual forbearance and courtesy each expected and reciprocated in its turn—until—there came upon the scene this belligerent and egotistic of all philosophies, Christianity, which alone was right and all others wrong; which alone took up the initiatory sword and torture instruments to force its fanatical and domineering doctrines against all others older and some more sane than their own.

The only peace foundation, which through its whole pernicious history has been the cause of more hatred, war and bloodshed than all other elements combined, and whose advocates have proved themselves in the main the most incompetent and yet the greatest bigots and hypocrites that religion ever produced.

The only foundation, whose own foundation rests upon a god stolen from the Jews because Christians could not invent one of their own strong enough to stand alone; the God of the despised Jews who in their creeds and dogmas they have always hypocritically prayed for as heretics—prayed to the god of the heretics! The god whose son begotten of the heretics' god was their own exclusive pet god, yet who when living clung to the heretic Jews, saying (Matt. xv, 24), "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and who in his national mock arrogance is supposed to have added, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs (xv, 26), and who distinctly limited this gospel of peace and joy to the heretic Jew only (x, 6) and expressly declared it was not for the Gentile (x, 5).

The god of the Christian philosophy is the son of the heretics' god who "in the beginning created the heavens and the earth." In the beginning. The beginning of what? Nature's universe is from eternity, and therefore impossible of creation previously, for eternity knows no "in the beginning," and therefore no god could pre-exist nature—the eternal infinitude of matter and motion—inseparable and unchangeable in its elements—impossible of creation out of nothing—filling immensity without a void—obeying no laws but its own. Nature is the only mother we know, of which we are an actual part.

You praters of a peace to be founded on the Christian philosophy, tell me who is your god, and what you mean by a god, and what you know of a god?

(He is a huge being in the form of man, as seen by Moses, who lives in heaven.)

If that is so, where was he before he made the heavens to live in? "He could not (as Augustine said) have been in heaven while he made heaven," and he could not have been outside the heavens that already filled infinitude.

(He is "the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, the only ruler of princes.")

Of course. A picture of the human conception, of the minds of those who would dominate men as kings, I would think of nothing higher or better than a replica of their own ambitions. This—od, of course, is a he, agreeable to the Jewish law of primogeniture in which the she was of little consequence.

("He is the Lord of Hosts, the Lord mighty in battle.")

Of course. Battle, which occupied most of the time and thoughts of the "heretics" and their prophets.

("God is a spirit.")

But could a spirit spue out of its mouth yonder solid rock? But that is a mere speck of dust. Could he breathe out of his spirit-self a solid planet? But that, too, is but a mere speck in the universe. Did he emit from himself the fiery ball of the sun—nay, millions of solid fiery suns and stars?

(But "God is love.")

Yes; and his son—he was a good shepherd, a sort of Bryan-Billy Sunday goat and sheep tender, whose sheep's ultimate end is to be fleeced and shorn.

A strange phantasmic conglomeration truly is this Christian philosophy, which still claims its thousands of poor deluded, credulous followers, who like poor silly sheep follow their leader blindly, though it be only to be shorn and fleeced; and the shepherd's crook comes in very handy to hook in "a feller's rocks" and filthy lucre.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

In Best of Humor.

Hyperbole.—"What on earth did that fellow mean when he said he was a peregrinating pedestrian, castigating his itinerary from the classic Athens of America." "He meant he was a tramp beating his way from Boston."—Baltimore American.

The Many-Sided Washington.—"Why is George Washington described as 'First in war and first in peace?'" "I dunno," replied Senator Sorghum. "I suspect somebody was trying to square him with both the preparedness people and the pacifists."—Washington Star.

The Difference.—"Blessed are the meek," quoted the deacon, in reproving the backslider, "for they shall inherit the earth."

"They may inherit all right, deacon," said the irreverent one, "but somehow or other they never seem to get possession."—British Weekly.

Added Offense.—Country Justice—"Ten and costs for reckless driving." Young Motorist—"Listen, Judge! We were on our way to your office to have you marry us." Justice—"Twenty and costs, then. You're a darned sight more reckless than I thought you were."—Judge.

"Providence."—The Kaiser's faith is beautiful. Addressing the army and navy, he says: "Our recent triumphal march through Rumania has by Divine Providence again added imperishable laurels to your banners." But what was the matter with Verdun? Where was Providence then?—San Francisco Star.

Safety First.—It was dusky in the secluded alcove, very dusky, and they sat silent. Something seemed to be on his mind. His face took on a strained look, like muddy coffee. He stirred uneasily, strangely. She flirted with her fan, he with her eyes. Suddenly the music struck up. It was his dance again, and she "adored" dancing.

"Damn," he whispered. Then she sprang it.

"Artie, what's the matter? You seem so uncomfortable." Artie shuffled his handkerchief.

"Well, Gertie, you see I only had one suspender button to start with and—oh, let's sit it out!"

Ominous.—Sentry (to McDougal, returning from wedding festivities)—Pass, friends, all's well.

McDougal—Thank ye, laddie. But ye dinna ken the guid wife or ye would no' be so sure.—London Opinion.

Wrongly Applied.—An American motoring through a small Scotch town was pulled up for excessive speed.

"Didn't you see that notice, 'Dead Slow?'" inquired the policeman.

"Course I did," returned the Yankee, "but I thought it referred to your durned little town!"

The Unemployed.—A New Orleans householder, says the Argonaut, advertised for a man to do chores around the place, and the advertisement was answered by a colored man. "Are you married?" asked the prospective employer. "Yas, suh, I'se married," replied the applicant, "but mah wife is out of a job."

Ill-Guided Zeal.—William Wilberforce, the slave-liberator, had a sister who was a hustler. She hustled for William at the hustings and succeeded in getting him elected to Parliament. On one occasion, when she had concluded her stump speech, some enthusiasts in the crowd shouted:

"Miss Wilberforce forever!" The lady stepped forward. "Gentlemen, I thank you," she said, "but, believe me, I do not wish to be Miss Wilberforce forever."—Tit-Bits.

Effective.—A lady entered a railroad-car and took a seat in front of a newly married couple. She was hardly seated before they began making remarks about her.

Her last year's bonnet and coat were fully criticized with more or less giggling on the bride's part, and there is no telling what might have come next if the lady had not put a sudden stop to the conversation by a bit of strategy.

She turned her head, noticed that the bride was considerably older than the groom, and, in the smoothest of tones, said:

"Madam, will you please ask your son to close the window?"

The "son" closed his mouth, and the bride no longer giggled.—New York Times.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

THE REASON WHY

A Story for Freethinkers

By ERNEST E. RUSSELL

We do not know which will be most admired in this book, the narrative or the argument, for both are rich. The author has pictured religion as it is preached and talked, and has added brilliant and informing chapters on modern thought about religion.

WAR AND NATURAL LAW.

The War Enthusiasts Get No Support From Our Present Scientific Knowledge.

BY PROF. JACQUES LOEB.

The notion that wars are necessary incidents in the working out of the law of the survival of the fittest is familiar enough. Prof. Jacques Loeb, the distinguished Monist and biologist, now with the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, New York, does not share it. At the recent meeting of American Men of Science, before the section of Naturalists, he read a paper entitled "Biology and War," in opposition to that view and to various false conclusions growing out of its acceptance. The address was published in a late number of Science, and is sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER by Professor Loeb.

BIOLOGY is not the science which can throw any light on the origin of war, since wars are caused by economic, political and social conditions. Although these conditions are in the last analysis based upon human instincts it does not seem profitable for the present to trace the connection.

It is also outside the speaker's problem to discuss the effects of war. Compared with the misery and anguish, the general loss of life and of liberty, and the economic waste caused by war, the possible hereditary effects on the population, if there are any, are too trivial to be mentioned.

As far as your speaker has been able to see, biology can at present offer a contribution to the problem of war in one direction only, namely, to test some of the claims of war enthusiasts who insist that from a biological viewpoint wars are justifiable or even desirable.

2. These war enthusiasts maintain that unless a nation engages occasionally in war it will lose all those virile virtues, especially courage, which are necessary for its survival. We do not need to argue whether the acts committed in a state of homicidal emotion are the real or only manifestations of courage; we may also overlook the manifestations of virility left behind by invading or retreating armies. The assumption that virility or courage (whatever may be meant by these terms) will disappear if not practiced in the form of war implies an unproven and apparently false biological assumption, namely, that functions not practiced or organs not used will disappear in the offspring. Such arguments were very common in biology before the experimental method was recognized as necessary to test the validity of our assumptions. Since experimental tests were made we have learned that eyes do not degenerate when animals are kept in the dark. Thus Payne raised sixty-nine successive generations of Drosophila in the dark without noticing any trace of degeneracy in the eye or its function. Uhlenhuth found that eyes when transplanted into the back of salamanders will (after a transitory degeneration) regenerate completely, and remain normal no matter whether the animals are kept in the dark or in the light. Hereditary blindness (e. g., hereditary glaucoma in man) is apparently due to a mutation (probably a chemical change in one chromosome) which originates, as far as our present facts show, independently of use or disuse of the eye. We know through Morgan's observations that insects with mutilated or rudimentary wings may arise suddenly as mutations from parents which used their wings. Lack of the practice of flying does according to our present knowledge no more lead to the hereditary disappearance of wings than darkness leads to hereditary tary degeneration of the eyes. The statement that a nation by not going to war will lose any of its inherited "virile virtues" is not supported by our present biological knowledge.

3. The biology of which the war enthusiasts make use is essentially antiquated, and so we need not be surprised to find that they consider war to be based on what they call the "biological law of nature," the "struggle for existence," or the "survival of the fittest." Such ideas are expressed by war enthusiasts in America as well as in Europe, and we may be permitted to make the following quotation without giving the name of its author.

"The struggle for existence is in the life of nature the basis of all healthy development. All existing things show themselves to be the result of contesting forces. So in the life of man the struggle is not merely the destructive but the life-giving principle. . . . The law of the stronger holds good everywhere. Those forms survive which are able to procure for themselves the most favorable conditions of life and to assert themselves in the universal economy of nature. The weaker succumb. This struggle is regulated and restrained by the unconscious sway of biological laws and by the interplay of opposite forces. In the plant world and the animal world this process is worked out in unconscious tragedy. In the human race it is consciously carried out, and regulated by social ordinances. The man of strong will and strong intellect tries by every means to assert himself . . . and in this effort the individual is far from being guided merely by the consciousness of right. . . . The nation is made up of individuals. . . . The motive which influences each member is prominent in the whole body. It is a persistent struggle for possessions . . . and right is respected so far only as it is compatible with advantage."

The "struggle for existence" and the "survival of the fittest" are no "laws of nature" in the sense in which the term law is used in the exact sciences. We speak of a law of nature when we are able to express a phenomenon as a mathematical function of its variables. We thus speak of a law of gravitation, of Ohm's law, or in biology of Mendel's law of segregation. As long as biologists did not realize that their statements needed not only a qualitative experimental test but also a quantitative verification they talked in a loose way, and this did not change until the methods of physics and physical chemistry began to invade biological research. The progress made by Mendel lay in this, that he introduced the quantitative method of the physicist into the investigations of hybridization and he was ignored because the zoologists and botanists of his time did not grasp the fact that the progress of science depends upon the invention or application of such methods.

The terms "survival of the fittest" or "struggle for existence" were never more than poor metaphors to express the fact that the chemical compounds required for the growth of organisms are restricted in quantity and that as a consequence unlimited reproduction of organisms is impossible. Aside from the limitation of food, the physical conditions (e. g., too low or too high a temperature) existing on the different parts of the globe, act as a restricting influence. The methods by which the stronger "conquer" weaker nations have nothing in common with the fact that salt water fish die when put into fresh water or that microorganisms cannot multiply unless they have their proper culture medium. The majority of organisms, e. g., plants, bacteria of the soil, and many others, can in no way be called predatory organisms. Of course, there are animals which are as brutal and predatory as the war enthusiasts think human beings should be—but this is a different thing from calling this brutality a universal law of living nature. Fortunately the normal human being does not belong to this brutal type.

There is a wide quantitative difference in the development of instincts and of the power of inhibition in different human individuals, and these differences may be hereditary. Individuals with a strong homicidal mania, who just manage to suppress their paranoic tendencies, will welcome war since it removes for them the burden of constant inhibition, and unfortunately such poorly balanced individuals have rather too frequently been the leaders of governments. No human society can be expected to exist unless the necessity of suppressing or curbing the harmful and pathological instincts of individuals is recognized, and a nation is liable to pay a high price for the privilege of having a semipathological individual at the head of its government.

4. The war enthusiasts also derive from what they are pleased to call the "law of nature" the statement that "superior races" have the right of impressing their civilization upon "inferior races." The information concerning the relative value of races is furnished by a group of writers who call themselves "racial biologists." This "racial biology" is based on quotations from the erudite statements of theologians, philologists, historians, politicians, anthropologists, and also occasionally of biologists, especially of the nonexperimenting type. The method of standardizing the different races is consequently neither quantitative nor experimental, for, as the best known "race biologist," Houston Chamberlain, says, "there is something in the world besides compass and yard measure. Where the learned fails with his artificial construction, one single unbiased glance can illuminate the truth like a sunbeam." A few quotations from Chamberlain will show how this method of "sunbeams" is applied in special cases. Thus Chamberlain tries to prove that the Celtic Bretons in France are really Germanic.

"These Celtic minds of former centuries, teeming with strength, are not merely free and not merely pious any more than the Breton seamen of today, but they are both free and pious, and it is this very combination that expresses what is specifically Germanic, as we observe it from a Charlemagne to Queen Louise."

PROF. JACQUES LOEB.

And as a sop to biology, Chamberlain states: "Let us therefore not be in too great a hurry to assert that Germanicism does not lie in blood; it does lie in it; not in the sense that this blood guarantees Germanic sentiment and capacity but that it makes these possible. This limitation is therefore a very clear one: as a rule that man is Germanic who is descended from Germanic ancestors."

It will not be necessary at a meeting of biologists to state that Mendelian characters are generally inherited singly and independently; and that we know nothing about the inheritance of piety and freedom, either separately or in Germanic linkage. The writer wishes also to apologize for being compelled to point out that it is not good biology to maintain that the oblique eyes of the Chinese or Japanese are an indication of an oblique character, or that in a hybrid the "bad" qualities of the parents are dominant over the "good" ones.

5. While the statements of the war enthusiasts will not be taken seriously by those familiar with the methods and results of experimental biology, the sad fact remains that this pseudobiology has had at least a share in the production of the tragedy which is being enacted in Europe. For wars are impossible unless the masses are aroused to a state of emotionalism and fanaticism, and the pseudobiology of literateurs and politicians may serve this purpose in the future as it has in the past. The government has at last begun to realize that it is its duty to protect the masses from the medical quack. Your speaker is of the opinion that the masses need equal protection from the irresponsible literateur or politician who makes it his business to spread the seed of fanaticism and emotionalism by a claim of knowledge of biology which he does not possess. The cure for this form of pernicious mischief is the spread of knowledge of the exact sciences which will put an end to the business of the pseudoscientist.

Since at present the making of war is left in the hands of the statesmen, it may be well to mention at least that the exact sciences have paved the way for the replacement of the present type of statesmanship by a new one; according to which statesmanship consists in the application of the results of the exact sciences to the improvement of the lot of humanity. This includes not only the technical but also the theoretical results of science, since these theoretical results will free the minds from all those forms of ignorance, superstition and fanaticism which are the culture medium of mob emotionalism. If we succeed in substituting for the present a new type of statesmen, who are familiar with and follow the development of the exact—i. e., the experimental and quantitative—sciences, and who are willing and capable of applying the results of exact science to the intellectual, moral, physical and economical uplift of the masses, we shall at least diminish the danger of war.

An interesting feature of the religious canvass made in New York on February 4 is that Protestants, Catholics and Jews combined and worked together in pairs of different denominations. It is to be presumed from this that the revival is not to be an attempt to convert people to Christianity, but to induce more people to attend religious meetings of any sort, and also to record the affiliations of each citizen. The general impression seems to be that if a person believes in and worships God, he is a good citizen, so far as spirituality is concerned; and if it is a fact that there is in reality only one God for all creation, the conclusion must be that all are worshipping the same one, regardless of their ideas of such deity or the nomenclature used in describing him. Jews and Christians unite in acknowledging Jehovah, but the Jews do not admit that the Messiah predicted has yet come. Catholics and Protestants believe in the accounts of the four gospels, but interpret them in two hundred ways. The Swedenborgians are now advertising their books here claiming that Swedenborg represented the second coming of Christ. Billy Sunday has just saved 60,510 souls at about 80 cents a soul. Professor Leuba of Bryn Mawr has published statistics to prove that over half the scientific men do not believe in a personal God, and are therefore more Agnostic than Thomas Paine. All of these reports within one week show that there still seems to be some confusion about theology.—A. M.

Progress is "an enemy of God." This now opprobrious epithet will become an honorable distinction when men understand that the friends of good must be foes of God.—R. C. Adams.

As investigators of religious and psychic phenomena we do not condemn religion. We explain it.

FRANK HARRIS AND JESUS

In the Light of Some Historical and Prophetic Remarks by Mark Twain.

The most elusive character of history is probably he whom people now call Jesus Christ. No one seems to know when he was born, where he first came to birth, or how (whether illegitimate or not), but the why of his birth was undoubtedly through the imaginations of men to institute a religion more binding, rigorous, cruel and oppressive than the Oriental sophistries that had gone before. Nor do men know when he died or where; and Mr. George Moore has as much right to write of Christ in the way he did in "The Brook Kerith" as the religious writers have to write in the way they do. Since Christ is a god-hero, born of the imaginations of men, a twentieth century novelist may treat this fictitious personage according to his novelistic fancy—and in any old way—as did Jack London in his "Star Rover," Marie Corelli in her "Barabbas," or as the latter writer portrayed the reincarnation of the devil in "The Sorrows of Satan"; yet neither Christ nor Satan ever existed outside of man's vivid imagination. It is simply because the social mind allows itself to be ruled by the will of the dead that it is now considered blasphemy, either by speech or in writing, to treat this Jesus in any other way than as a god.

I therefore agree more fully with what Richard Ellsworth says (TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 23, 1916) than with the ideas of Frank Harris as set forth in his article, "George Moore and Jesus" (Pearson's Magazine for January, 1917).

Mr. Ellsworth wrote: "There has always been a feeling of distrust among men regarding a person the date of whose birth is unknown. Knowing the day upon which a certain man was born may add nothing to the greatness of his character, but it will add materially to the certainty of his existence, and to the value to be placed upon the nature of his mission. There is absolutely no authentic record of the birthday of Christ. The New Testament, which alone gives the history of Jesus Christ, affords no incontestable proof as to when he was born."

There is no evidence of the existence of the historical Jesus outside of the New Testament, but there are things in the Old Testament, visionary in character—the dream-stuff of those old "dreamers of dreams" of that ancient day—that are twisted in their interpretation to prophetically presignify his coming as Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world; the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world; the Son of God; the Light that lighteth the world in its darkness of ignorance, and many other foolish things of like nature and quality. When we come to read the story of his life, however, as given by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, we find such differences concerning his birth and the facts surrounding his career that we begin to wonder if his existence upon this mundane sphere is not purely mythic; and when men of the ripest scholarship, such as Strauss, Drews, Prof. Wm. Benjamin Smith, W. W. Hardwicke, M.D., and others, try to find this Christ by the method of historical research only a name stretching its way across the centuries of time comes into view; and while the psychological power surrounding this name has played the devil with the world, the man himself fades into the nothingness of an empty dream, the metaphysical inspiration of a religious abstraction, the psychological expression of an intellectual vacuum—the latter being something which nature herself abhors and will have naught of, yet man, the worshipful animal, is willing to render worship unto vacuity and dreams instead of something more material, tangible and humanly existent.

In his "Study of Origins" Mr. Ellsworth continues:

"St. Matthew places the date during the reign of King Herod, but St. Luke states that the event occurred when Cyrenius was governor of Syria. Now Herod was not living when Cyrenius was appointed to his Syrian governorship, therefore one or the other of these inspired evangelists is wrong in his calculations; and we know from our present information regarding the circumstance that both are wrong.

"For more than nineteen hundred years Christian chronologists have studied to fix the date of the birth of their redeemer, and have not yet reached any agreement that is even suggestive of certitude. The year, the month, and the day are all unknown. Almost every month in the year has been assigned to the event. For a time it was observed on the 20th of May, then on the 19th or 20th of April, and again on the 5th of January. Some supposed that he was born in the year 4 B. C.; others place the year as late as A. D. 10.

"The fixing of the date as a religious festival has been attributed to Telesphorus, who flourished during the reign of Antoninus Pius (A. D. 138-161), but the first certain traces of its being kept on the 25th of December are found about the time of the Emperor Commodus (A. D. 180-192)."

But it seems that one of the most brilliant journalists of New York City, Frank Harris, the present editor of Pearson's Magazine, as well as the companion of some of the most intellectual literateurs of Europe for many years, must let himself get caught in the fog of Christian delusion and superstition and believe not only in the actual existence of this Jesus but in his Christly saintliness as well.

While one sees very clearly that Mr. Harris has not the historical perspective of a scientist, yet he claims to be an evolutionist as in the following words he puts himself on record concerning Jesus:

"But afterwards I learned something of what the theory of evolution implies; realized that all great men are moments in the life of mankind, and that the lesson of every great life in the past must be learned before we can hope to push further into the Unknown than our predecessors. Gradually I came to understand that Jerusalem and not Athens is the sacred city and that one has to love Jesus and his gospel of love and pity or one will never come to full stature. Born rebels even have to realize that Love is the Way, the Truth and the Life; no one cometh to wisdom but by Love."

Now we will italicize the rest of the paragraph:

"The more I studied Jesus the greater he became to me till little by little he changed my whole outlook on life. I have been convinced for years that the modern world in turning its back on Jesus and ignoring his teachings has gone hopelessly astray. It has listened to false prophets and followed blind guides and has fallen into the ditch. It must retrace its steps. It must learn the lessons of love and pity, of gentle thought for others, and the soft words that turn aside wrath; it must subdue pride and cultivate amiability. There must be a spiritual rebirth; we must submit ourselves again like little children to sit at the feet of the Master; all the best lessons are learned by Faith" (Pearson's Magazine, January, 1917).

All of this makes very interesting reading and is helpful to us in studying the psychology of a Frank Harris, but is it true? Is the character of Jesus as portrayed in the New Testament really as lovable and gentle as Mr. Harris would have us believe?

According to the record, Christ's love and respect for his mother was a minus quantity, while our own Ingersoll excels him in this respect; and Ingersoll, being a lovable man and not a stony-hearted god, created a home atmosphere of love and affection. Would Mr. Harris have us repudiate our mothers as did Jesus on one memorable occasion, join ourselves to celibacy like himself and the Roman Catholic priesthood; or have homes wherein love dwells supreme, with wives and children there to bless us? Would Harris have us lead the wandering life of Jesus, without where to lay our heads (except the jail if caught by the cops), or feel the soft caresses of our sweetheart-wives and indulge in the domesticity of home? In neither Christ nor Buddha is the home-life a very predominating factor; and you know Christ gave as one of his standards of discipleship that "unless a man leave father and mother, sisters and brothers" and follow him he cannot become his disciple. Christ also said, that "in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. xxii, 30); and if this is true, all our married people are doomed to hell. Heaven is therefore a place for eunuchs, celibate priests, nuns, old bachelors and spinsters.

Mr. Harris speaks of "loving Jesus" and "his gospel of love and pity." But let it be understood that Jesus Christ was no Bryan pacifist, and the doctrine of love voiced in the following words shows the impatience of a very ill-tempered man for those who would not acknowledge his "divine mission":

"But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven."

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I come not to send peace, but a sword."

"For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law."

"And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me."—Matt. x, 33-37. (See also Luke xii, 49-53.)

It strikes me that the believers in Christianity have been following "the believe or be damned" advice of the divine paranoiac, Jesus Christ, for all these many generations of time, and the above cited prophecy has been fulfilled in the present family row in Europe. Nowhere in the New Testament do we see that Christ showed himself as an embodiment of humility. On the contrary, he was the embodiment of pride, anger, "righteous" wrath, and supernatural egotism.

For further illustration of the results of Christianity, also read the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, seventh verse; the thirteenth chapter of Mark, eighth verse; and the twenty-first chapter of Luke, tenth verse. This "nation rising against nation" and family against family is what has been going on over in Europe for nearly three years now, and no one sees the end of it.

One logical statement Matthew gives us as being made by this Jesus is that "they who use the sword shall perish by the sword" (Matt. xxvi, 52), and the Christian nations of Europe are busily engaged in showing the truth of that assertion and sending each one another's soul to heaven or hell as the case may be. But as an advocate for "preparedness," Jesus is reported by Luke to have remarked:

"And he that hath no sword let him sell his garment, and buy one."—Luke xxii, 36.

And William of Hohenzollern, as the most Christian monarch of Europe, took this advice and had a treasure chest in which he was preparing for from thirty to forty years for the present European war.

Again, we would ask Mr. Harris if Jesus took much "gentle thought for others" or used "the soft words that turn away wrath" in his excoriation of the scribes and Pharisees as given in the twenty-third chapter of St. Matthew?

That Kaiser Wilhelm is not only a Christian monarch but a Christian preacher as well may be seen by the sermon he delivered before the officers and crew of the imperial armored yacht, Hohenzollern, in the early part of the conflict. His subject was "The Power of Prayer," and he took for his text Exodus xvii, 11:

"And it came to pass when Moses held up his hand that Israel prevailed, and when he let down his hand Amalek prevailed."

Among other things this military king-preacher said in his sermon were the following:

"God, the Lord, has hung in every heart a prayer bell. Yet how often in the sunshine of life is it silent and dumb! But when the storm wind of trouble comes it begins to ring. How many a comrade who had forgotten how to pray will clasp his hands once more out there in the death struggle! Necessity teaches prayer. So let it be here at home. Let the serious days which have come upon us, the storm of war which has broken out, set the prayer bells swinging again! Let us pray for our fighting brothers. Not only now and then in a solemn hour; no, no! Let us pray constantly.

"As our fathers in troublous times set the bells pealing every evening, and at the sound uncovered their heads and prayed: 'Lord Jesus Christ, with us abide, for it is now the eventide,' let us never forget our prayers.

"Moses held up his hand until the sun went down, and so Joshua slew Amalek with the sword. Our fight will not be ended in a day. But let us not allow our hands to grow weary, nor let them sink until victory is gained. Let our prayers be a wall of fire around our brother's camp.

"The historian will some day write of the wars of our day. But man sees only what is visible to the eye, so he can say only what the wisdom of generals, the bravery of troops, the sharpness of weapons have accomplished. Eternity will reveal much more. It will show how the hidden prayers of the faithful were a mighty power in these battles, how the ancient promise was again fulfilled: 'Call upon Me in the time of trouble and I will save thee.' And, therefore, hold fast to prayer. Amen."

And the doctrine of the power of prayer is one of the fundamental beliefs of Christianity!

In conclusion we refer Mr. Harris to Mark Twain's latest book, "The Mysterious Stranger," as to what Christianity has done for the human race; and Mark Twain is a writer superior to Mr. George Moore. The following excerpt shows what the world has experienced in taking the advice of the "gentleman" Jesus, or of some one speaking in his name. In one part of the book this "stranger," as the special friend of three boys in an Austrian village in the sixteenth century, portrays to them the history of the world from the beginning (according to their ideas) to their times and beyond by a series of panoramic views like moving pictures upon a screen:

"We were always watching out for him, for life was never stagnant when he was by. He came upon us at that place in the woods where we had first met him. Being boys, we wanted to be entertained; we asked him to do a show for us.

"Very well," he said; 'would you like to see a history of the progress of the human race?—its development of that product which it calls civilization?'

We said we should.

"So, with a thought, he turned the place into the Garden of Eden, and we saw Abel praying by his altar; then Cain came walking toward him with his club, and did not seem to see us, and would have stepped on my foot if I had not drawn it in. He spoke to his brother in a language which we did not understand; then grew violent and threatening, and we knew what was going to happen, and turned away our heads for the moment; but we heard the crash of the blows and heard the shrieks and the groans; then there was silence, and we saw Abel lying in his blood and gasping out his life, and Cain standing over him and looking down at him, vengeful and unrepentant.

"Then the vision vanished, and was followed by a long series of unknown wars, murders, and massacres. Next we had the Flood, and the Ark tossing around in the stormy waters, with lofty mountains in the distance showing veiled and dim through the rain. The Angel said:

"The progress of your race was not satisfactory. It is to have another chance now."

"The scene changed, and we saw Noah overcome with wine.

"Next, we had Sodom and Gomorrah, and 'the attempt to discover two or three respectable persons there,' as the Angel described it. Next, Lot and his daughters in the cave.

"Next came the Hebraic wars, and we saw the victors massacre the survivors and their cattle, and save the young girls alive and distribute them around.

"Next we had Jael; and saw her slip into the tent and drive the nail into the temple of her sleeping guest; and we were so close that when the blood gushed out it trickled in a little red stream at our feet, and we could have stained our hands in it if we had wanted to.

"Next we had Egyptian wars, Greek wars, Roman wars, hideous drenchings of the earth with blood; and we saw the treacheries of the Romans towards the Carthaginians, and the sickening spectacle of the massacre of those brave people. Also we saw Caesar invade Britain—'not that those barbarians had done him any harm, but because he wanted their land, and desired to confer the blessings of civilization upon their widows and orphans,' as the Angel explained.

"Next, Christianity was born. Then the ages of Europe passed in review before us, and we saw Christianity and Civilization march hand in hand through those ages, 'leaving famine and death and desolation in their wake, and other signs of the progress of the human race,' as the Angel observed.

"Then the Holy Inquisition was born—'another step in your progress,' the Angel said. He showed us thousands of torn and mutilated heretics shrieking under the torture, and other thousands and thousands of heretics and witches burning at the stake, 'always in the pleasant shade flung by the peaceful banner of the cross,' as the Angel remarked. And in the midst of these fearful spectacles, as an incidental matter, we had a marvelous night-show, by the light of flitting and flying torches—the butchery of Christian by Christian in France on Bartholomew's Day.

"And always we had wars, and more wars, and still other wars—all over Europe, all over the world. 'Sometimes in the private interest of royal families,' the Angel said, 'sometimes to crush a weak nation; but never a war started by the aggressor for any clean purpose—there is no such war in the history of the race.'

"Now," said the Angel, 'you have seen your progress down to the present, and you must confess that it is wonderful—in its way. We must now exhibit the future.'

"He showed us slaughters more terrible in their destruction of life, more devastating in their engines of war, than any we had seen.

"You perceive," he said, 'that you have made continual progress. Cain did his murder with a club; the Hebrews did their murders with javelins and swords; the Greeks and Romans added protective armor and the fine arts of military organization and generalship; the Christian has added guns and gunpowder; a few centuries from now he will have so greatly improved the deadly effectiveness of his weapons of slaughter that all men will confess that without the Christian civilization war must have remained a poor and trifling thing to the end of time.

"It is a remarkable progress. In five or six thousand years five or six high civilizations have risen, flourished, commanded the wonder of the world, then faded out and disappeared; and not one of them except the latest ever invented any sweetening and adequate way to kill people. They all did their best, to kill being the chief ambition of the human race and the earliest incident of its history, but only the Christian civilization has scored a triumph to be proud of. Two or three centuries from now it will be recognized that all the competent killers are Christians; then the pagan will go to school to the Christian—not to acquire his religion, but his guns. The Turk and the Chinaman will buy those to kill missionaries and converts with.'"

"By their fruits ye shall know them!" said the Christ, and by its historical fruits Christianity is condemned by the very civilization it is now destroying!

JOHN A. MORRIS.

"Economic Cranks."

About two months ago I delivered in a large eastern city my lecture on "Abraham Lincoln: President, Freethinker, Liberator." At the close, the usual criticisms were invited. An old gentleman with snow-white beard—who, strange to say, was an American—arose and remarked: "I do not see why any man should lecture on Lincoln. He is dead, and not worth talking about." Well, more books have been written concerning Lincoln than any other American statesman, not even excepting Washington, and also more newspaper and magazine articles. His words have been quoted more than any other. His opinions are looked upon as of more value than any other. Yet here was a man who thought Lincoln was not worth talking about! Truly, I thought at the moment that I was in the presence of a great man. The explanation came when the gentleman added: "What we ought to hear is a lecture on economics." He was one of those "economic cranks."

In using this term it is far from my intention to cast reflection upon anyone who is a student of and speaker on economic questions. I only refer to those who have no patience to listen to other subjects discussed, and who say that when the economic question is settled the religious question will be also settled, therefore it is not necessary to have Freethought lectures or publish Freethought papers.

A lady in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 10 clinches, as she thinks, her argument by saying that Thomas Paine wrote nothing upon religion until he was fifty-seven years old, "devoting more than half his life to the study of economic conditions." This reference to Paine is most unfortunate for the lady's cause. The time of his writing on religion is immaterial in the case. But if the lady had read the "Age of Reason" with care, she would have known the real reason for putting this work off until his later years. It was not because he thought the discussion of religious questions unnecessary, but because he wanted anything he might write on these subjects to be the result of his maturest thought and ripest experience. Then he must have considered them more important than his economic writings! Now here are two nuts for the "economic crank" to crack: Paine wrote "Common Sense" in America, which resulted in American political independence of England. But did political independence cause religious liberty, free thought, free speech and free press? No! While we have made advances in these, we are obliged to fight along the same lines today. In England he published the "Rights of Man," which has probably done more than any other book to loosen the grip of kingcraft on that country. Yet it was years afterwards before a man could there publicly express his opinions upon religion without going to jail. Here is the nature of the religionist: He may concede your every right, until you say something against his great Mumbo Jumbo. Why? Because on this subject he has read nothing and never been taught to think.

Those who say that only the discussion of economic questions is necessary, and that the settlement of these questions will settle all others, are about the most narrow-minded people I ever met—not even excepting the Catholics, Presbyterians or Methodists. They might as well say that if a boy in school studies arithmetic it is not necessary for him to know anything of grammar, or if he studies geography he needs no knowledge of history. Economic questions should be discussed. So should Freethought subjects, but not from the same platform at the same time. Socialists want to unite people of all theological beliefs under the banner of their party. That is all right. Freethinkers have also the right to unite people in defense of universal mental liberty, free speech and free press regardless of their economic opinions. And while the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is good enough to give these "economic cranks" one page of his journal, they would like to grab it all, notwithstanding that they have about fifty of their own! And yet these are the people whose battle-cry is the greed of Capitalism! I am a Socialist, but if this were the spirit of all Socialists, it would be just as well if Rockefeller, Morgan and Carnegie continued to rule the country.

A Chance for Writers.

Our Missionary Editor, Atwood Manville, offers the premium of $50 to any TRUTH SEEKER subscriber who will get an article on Freethought published in any prominent magazine that is for sale on the newsstands of the New York subway. The conditions are that the article shall be an attack on the Bible, that it shall contain at least 2,000 words, and that it shall appear before October, 1917. The first published will receive the prize. It is not insisted that the periodical shall be a magazine, so long as it is for sale in the subway stations. Mr. Manville, for whose responsibility we can vouch, is the author of the tract "People vs. The Holy Bible," and we assume that an article following out the argument therein contained would be satisfactory to him and obtain the reward.

They Don't Unite.

We hear it said now and then, in some attempt to unite the various Christian organizations into one body of endeavor, that the Christian churches and Christian denominations all agree upon the essentials of Christianity and differ only on minor matters.

If there is no essential difference in what the many sectarian churches are teaching, why do they not unite? If there is no particular difference between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, why do Protestants and Roman Catholics hate each other? If Presbyterians are essentially the same as Methodists, why do they fight one another?

Everybody knows that sectarianism is the scandal of Christianity. If the Universalists do not differ upon any necessary point of salvation from the Baptists, why do they maintain separate organizations?

For a single Christian denomination to admit that it exists upon what is not essential, nay, upon what is not absolutely requisite to human salvation hereafter, is for that denomination to confess that it has no reason to exist at all.

This will not do. The fact is that every sect in Christendom is built upon a gospel foundation, and this fact is a commentary on the so-called gospel of Jesus that reflects upon its character in a way that utterly destroys the claim of divinity for it. If there was only one way of salvation declared in the New Testament, there should be only one Christian church; only one Christian denomination; only one way to get into heaven, and only one way to keep out of hell.

Let us look at this matter without any sectarian bias. Instead of saying that any Christian sect is wrong, I am bound to say that everyone is right, and instead of saying that the words of Jesus support only one Christian denomination, I am compelled to say that a dozen more could be founded upon them. I cannot agree with the assertion that nonessentials only divide the Christian body of believers. Between Pope Benedict and Courtland Meyers there is no Christian resemblance, no spiritual similarity. It seems to me that the church which says that baptism is necessary to salvation, and the church which makes faith the important part of the saving process, differ upon something which cannot be called a nonessential.

If anything is essential it is how man is to be saved; and if one body of Christians says that man is saved in one way and another body says that he is saved in a different way, it looks as though they were divided on the most vital point of the scheme of salvation.

The question which has most of destiny in it is: What shall man do to be saved?

It cannot be denied that men read differently the gospel in the New Testament, nor can it be denied that there is reason for different readings of it. We find Jesus saying in one place: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," and in another place, in answer to the question: "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" he says, "Keep the commandments." Now, only one of these directions can be right, unless the language of Jesus is to be understood as was the answer which the man gave to another who inquired how far it was to a certain town. "It is about thirteen miles if you keep on the way you are going now," the man said, "but if you go in the opposite direction, it is a little more than twenty-four thousand miles."

There is nothing in the commandments about believing anything or about being baptized. If the first way to eternal life is the only way, why did not Jesus say the same words to the young man which he said to his disciples? And if the other way to salvation is the right way, why did not Jesus tell the disciples what he told the young man? It is absurd to claim that there is no essential difference in these two ways of salvation. One requires obedience to the moral experience of human society; the other requires faith and the observance of a certain ecclesiastical rite.

If there is no particular difference, we would respectfully ask why there is not a Christian church on the earth that stands upon the answer which Jesus made to the question of the young man?

Not an individual could become a member of a single Christian church by saying that he had kept the commandments which Jesus mentioned as the way to eternal life.

It is enough to show that there is a vital difference between these two ways of salvation from the fact that every Christian church slams its door in the face of the highest morality but opens it wide to the stupidest faith. L. K. W.

What Is Invasion.

We should like to know who is sending to everybody, at his home and at his place of business, a postal card with "return" attached, the latter addressed to his congressman, and to be filled out with "Yes" or "No" on the question of peace or war. The return card states:

[Note: In modifying her war zone note Germany has offered safe passage for all American passenger ships which keep to a prescribed course and which our government guarantees free from contraband.]

The questions follow:

1. "Do you think we should enter this war in order to uphold our legal right to go into the war zone regardless of these conditions?"
2. "Do you think that the people should be consulted by referendum before Congress declares war—except in case of threatened invasion?"

Persons receiving the card are asked by the senders, who are officers of the "American Union Against Militarism," to answer these questions, Yes or No. We do not see how a thoughtful person can commit himself to one side or the other by a categorical reply. The fact that Germany is liberal enough to offer a safe route to American passenger ships provided the course marked out by her is followed and they have the guarantee from this government that they carry nothing that Germany defines as contraband, does not prevent the inquiry from arising in our mind as to whether we ought to concede to any nation jurisdiction over a zone our commerce requires we should traverse.

As regards the first question, whether we should "enter this war," it should be revised so as to inquire whether we ought to show fight if this war enters us. And when we read in the second query the proviso "except in case of threatened invasion," we want to know the difference between putting a torpedo under a mixed train on land and projecting the explosive against the side of a passenger and freight ship at sea. In each case there is an invasion, since the deck of one of our ships is reckoned American soil as regards the rights of those standing on it. Hence the question should be: "In view of the threatened invasion, do you think that the people should be consulted by referendum before Congress declares war?" We have no objection to such a referendum when the proposition is put so that the people will know what they are voting on.

To any war started as the present one was, by a large nation taking military action against a small one because of an assassination committed by an irresponsible person, we are wholly opposed; as we are to war in general. We have said we prefer peace at any price, because there is nothing so valuable that we can afford to barter peace to gain it. And after this is said we are still obliged to recognize a difference between what is properly called war and what may be properly called an extension, through the army and navy, of the powers of the peace officer—the constable, the policeman—to protect the lives and property of citizens and bring the assailant to justice.

We do not believe that the United States should discuss with any nation a proposal like that in Germany's war zone note. We do not believe that submitting to the conditions proposed would be peace, or that disregarding them and punishing unprovoked assaults on our ships would be war. The government would be abandoning its protective function in one case and exercising it in the other, and should be judged exactly as though these things took place ashore and citizens were injured by foreign agents while going about their lawful occasions.

About the extent to which governments should be administrative we may allow the political economists to dispute without interrupting them; but a government that is not protective of the last right of citizens fails miserably to justify its establishment and existence.

Sir Oliver Lodge and Spiritism.

Since Sir Oliver Lodge published his very unusual book, "Raymond, or Life and Death," he has received through the public prints a large amount of exploitation, which, it is feared, will add nothing to his reputation as a reliable scientist. Sir Oliver's son, Raymond, was killed while serving with the British army at Hooga, in Flanders, on September 14, 1915. The object of the newly-published work is to record in permanent form certain alleged conversations of the living members of the Lodge family with the spirit of the dead Raymond, through the mediumship of a "control" named Fedra.

On reading some of these conversations, we were immediately struck with the vein of nonsense and stupidity which, like all similar recorded performances, characterizes them throughout. For instance, the spirits in the other world ask for cigars and whisky sodas, and get them. There are streets there, and the houses are built of brick and stone. Flowers blossom in profusion, but differ from those on earth in that they never fade. There are no judges there nor laws to coerce men into any particular plan of action, but each person simply "gravitates" to one of a similar mind and disposition. In answer to a question put to him by his mother, Raymond tells her how one day he saw "some boys pass on who had nasty ideas and vices. They go to a place I'm very glad I didn't have to go to, it's not hell exactly. More like a reformatory—it's a place where you're given a chance, and when you want to look for something better, you're given a chance to have it. They gravitate together, but get so bored." This authentic picture of hell, portrayed by an eye witness, ought to prove very gratifying to the great rank and file of Christians, who, recalling the words of "Holy Writ" that "many are called but few chosen," fear that they were predestined to that final abode.

The climax of nonsense is reached when Raymond describes for his father's benefit the difference in the nature of "smells" in heaven from those on earth, and the contrary use to which they may be put. "Everything dead has a smell, if you notice; and I know now that the smell is of actual use, because it is from that smell that we are able to produce duplicates of whatever form it had before it became a smell. . . . My suit, I expect, was made from decayed worsted on your side." Imagine a suit of clothes, if you can, made out of the smell of decaying worsted! There is much matter of a character similar to these quotations to be found in these messages from the dead. Those that we have given are sufficiently illustrative of all.

It is with considerable reluctance that we venture to question the scientific standing of the author of this book. Sir Oliver Lodge had long been recognized as a scientific scholar of considerable repute until he took up with the vagaries of spiritism, and allied himself with the members of the Society for Psychical Research, which, in the persons of Hyslop, Carrington, Conan Doyle and others, is now endeavoring to impress the world with the notion that the immortality of the soul is capable of a scientific demonstration. Lodge, like Agassiz, seems to be impressed with the certitude of the fundamentals of Christianity, notwithstanding the fact that creditable science has everywhere asserted that they are not capable of such a manifestation as would make them approved by its sanest exponents. Mr. Joseph McCabe, in his book, "The Religion of Sir Oliver," has analyzed with much care and in a very conservative spirit this religious scientist, and the conclusion that one naturally draws from his exposition is that, like many another man who believes that true science and religion can be harmonized, Sir Oliver must be placed in a class by himself; or at least with those who are religious first and scientific later, provided science (as they apprehend it) is in accord with their religion.

It is greatly to be deplored that a man of the high social and intellectual standing of Sir Oliver Lodge, who was a pioneer in the discovery of wireless telegraphy, and who has made many inventions of unquestioned scientific value, should lend his credence to a system of humbuggery quite as deceptive as the performances of any sleight of hand genius. The ignorance which "mediums" make the spirits of the learned dead to exhibit in the writing and words attributed to them is in itself sufficient proof that the whole idea of spiritism is but one of the many phases of superstition which have gathered around the notion of religion. When we consider that the existence of the soul as understood by religionists has never been proved, and consequently its immortality is a remote consideration; when we recall the fact that heaven and hell are but the imaginings of the fevered religious brain, it seems inconceivable that any first-class thinker would risk his reputation by publishing his approval of a congeries of absurdities under the stress of a great personal bereavement!

It is because there is a small body of men calling themselves scientists while professing to hold some of the tenets of Christianity, that the church blandly asserts that all real scientists are Christians; and all those who hold that a belief in religion is incompatible with the highest scientific attainments are to be looked upon as pseudo-scientists—men quite unreliable when the issue becomes a question of authority. It is just in a case like this that the great value of Professor Leuba's recent volume on "God and Immortality" makes itself most effective. There is no mistaking the force of his statistics. The greatest scientific minds of the day are not and cannot be favorable to theological dogmatism. The irreconcilable opposition between the two is now complete, notwithstanding the judgment of Sir Oliver Lodge and all who agree with him. Religion and science, as fields of human inquiry and speculation, were one and the same thing in the long days during which the human intellect expanded from mere brute awe of the unknown into those marvelous surroundings of the universe which called forth its keenest judgment and powers of discernment; but now that man has attained to summit heights of invention and discovery, the two are no longer one, for science has entered a field of investigation where religion cannot follow, and where the basis of truth has become fact, and not faith. Exorcism and Witchcraft.

Buttressed by Bible and Testament and encouraged by religion, withcraft and demonology find twentieth-century believers. A Roman Catholic householder in Newark, N. J., reported the presence of evil spirits in his home, where he declared that bottles were uncorked, pictures turned to the wall, flatirons moved from their places, the lidlifter of the stove caused to perform tricks, while various normally inanimate objects appeared endowed with life. The house attained notoriety. The New York Sun reported:

"The ghosts have attracted the attention of all Newark. Thousands of New Jersey automobilists went out of their way to pass by the haunted house, and the block was crowded all day by pedestrians who had traveled there in the hope of seeing some manifestation.

"Several policemen were stationed in the block to handle the traffic, which got so dense three times during the afternoon that it was found necessary to summon the reserves to guard against accidents."

The householder, being a Roman Catholic, proceeded in the approved manner. He applied to his priest to execute his office as exorcist, which was done in due form. The priest procured "twelve holy medals," which he placed carefully in the "haunted" rooms. One was placed on a picture that showed a dead sister-in-law in her coffin lying in state before the altar of a church, another on the mantelpiece, and one in every closet; whereupon the evil spirits fled and the occupants were troubled no more.

At about the time these exorcisms were proceeding in Newark, five policemen were guarding a house in Detroit, Michigan, to protect a young woman occupying it from the violence or curiosity of five hundred persons who had been informed that the girl was a witch. The report said she had the power to transform herself into a lion, bear, and so on, and there were enough who took stock in the story to draw a crowd of half a thousand.

So it is proved that the enlightenment that is supposed to have dissipated the witchcraft delusion is only apparent. There are thousands it has not reached. Only the legal penalty, as with heresy, has been abolished. Given ignorance and Roman Catholicism, and the conditions of witchhanging days are made possible at any time or place.

Announcing in time that Girard College will next year celebrate "the three score and ten of its foundation by the Immortal Pioneer Merchant," the Philadelphia Public Ledger devotes a page of its pictorial section to photographs of the college, with its new $600,000 high school, its grounds, gymnasium, student body, president, and, in the centre of the whole layout, its church! The church might pass for a cathedral, but the caption under the cut reads:

"THE CHAPEL WITH OTHER COLLEGE INSTITUTIONS PERPETUATES THE MEMORY OF THE FOUNDER."

The chapel can perpetuate the memory of Girard only through the contrast between the fact of its existence on ground paid for by Girard, and in connection with his college, and the other fact that the will of Girard not only made no provision for such a use of his money but specifically excluded the teachers of religion from the institution he founded. The chapel does not, then, "perpetuate the memory of the founder" in any right sense. It perpetuates only the recreancy of the trustees to the trust which he reposed in them, and convicts religion of theft. They have stolen funds that belonged to a Freethinker and built a chapel with them. Notwithstanding the evidences of its felony, religion has the face to pose as the teacher and protector of morality. Its morality is of a kind from which honesty and fidelity to trust are excluded.

The Missionary Department.

It requires no intelligence to be a Christian, but considerable to quit.

Evolution in religious thought seems to run somewhat as follows: Paganism—Catholicism—Protestantism—Unitarianism—Rationalism. Two families that we know have recently abandoned the third for the fourth stage, due partly to THE TRUTH SEEKER books. The desire for a place to congregate is a natural one, and such Sunday evening forums as those at the New York Church of the Ascension (Episcopalian) and the Church of the Messiah (Unitarian) denote an evolution from the accustomed services that is a step towards Rationalism. At those forums are discussed almost every subject except religious doctrines, and a man can declare that there is no God without creating a sensation. Some years ago, in a small town, an entire congregation turned from one Protestant denomination to another, and vigorous propaganda directed towards Congregational churches might change them to Rationalistic societies. The Unitarianism described by Mr. Palmer is admirable compared to Catholicism, or any other of the Protestant sects, and should be welcomed rather than criticised, for they have no creeds, no doctrines, not the same fear of facing facts, and consider Jesus only human. They are in error in their view of the historicity of Jesus and possibly in their conception of God, but believe in freedom of thought to some extent and are merely ignorant of the facts about the Bible. It should be a much easier task to educate members of these sects than those who are bound by the doctrine of the atonement and other such absurdities.

How can we reform the Roman Catholics? It does no good to marry them, for they insist upon pre-nuptial agreements requiring that the offspring shall be Catholics. It does no good to divorce them, for they do not recognize divorce, unless the Catholic party is rich. It does no good to show the fallacies in the Bible, for they claim that the church is superior to scripture; they know the Bible too well to let their people read it. It is no use trying to destroy their faith, for they believe more sincerely than the more intelligent Protestants. We cannot kill all the first-born, but we may stop the Catholic schools that are now accepted substitutes for public schools, and we may refuse exemption for their property. But in what way will it ever be possible to stop the spread of the most dangerous and superstitious of all the sects? Is it hopeless?

OPEN LETTER TO "THE SURVEY."

You have refused to accept a free subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your reply was courteous, but we infer that you would be unwilling to have a Freethought publication around your office. Some of your Cooperating subscribers are also supporters of our paper. We are both working for the abolition of false methods of living and the substitution of the truth. If we published the articles on birth control and venereal disease that you publish, we should be suppressed. If parts of the Bible were distributed separately they would be considered illegally obscene. You are doing good; the Bible is not.

If our facts are false, or arguments untrue, why not refute them? On any other subject you would not run away from an investigation. Read two of our books, and if you make an affidavit that they are not nearer the truth than the Bible, we shall subscribe $50 to your work.

Proposed Lectures in New England.

Mr. Michael T. Rush of 3 Bowdoin street, Boston, Mass., would like to hear from Freethinkers throughout New England. He has in mind the fact that Mr. Joseph McCabe of England is now in this country, and if possible he would arrange to have lectures given by Mr. McCabe in the larger New England cities. All Freethinkers who can cooperate with Mr. Rush in this matter are asked to communicate with him at the address given. At this writing Mr. McCabe is in the West, but will shortly return to speak before the university students at Columbia in this city, and in view of the present state of transatlantic passenger service may consent to a protracted stay if lecture engagements are made. Mr. Rush, who brings up the proposal for lectures in New England, is one of the pillars of Freethought in Boston. Let the brethren write him what they can do.

A Freethought society organized at Clarksburg, W. Va., is named the Clarksburg Rationalist Society. At the opening meeting a paper was read on the "Scope, Nature and Purposes of Rationalism" by Hugh M. Martin, and there were elected a president, a secretary and other necessary officers. All Rationalists of central West Virginia are invited to affiliate themselves with this organization. Any information they may desire concerning it they may obtain from the secretary, G. A. Miller, 644 So. Seventh street, Clarksburg.

MILLIONS OF YEARS AGO!

Our Religious Teachers Weak on the Past— What Do They Know of the Future?

Why are so few people interested in the study of the development of the human races in past, pre-historic times while so many engage their attention with the capricious superstitions of ignorant men of today? People are very curious about the unknown future, but neglect to inquire into the past, the only key to future events. We have now positive evidence, that thinking men and women have lived upon this earth for more than a hundred thousand years; after the troubles of the human races had begun a long time before. How many well-established superstitions have come and gone since the infancy of human understanding? One medicine-man, Moses, told the god of his tribe: "Repent of this evil!" (Ex. xxxii, 12) and another one, Jeremiah, said to his creator of the world: "Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar?" (Jer. xv, 18).

Science gives us every day a clearer view of the great past of the human races. As we now place all sorts of documents in the cornerstones of great buildings, so before historic times the warriors were buried with their weapons and the industrial accomplishments of the tribe. When exhuming such graves now, we can construct a fair history of the last 20,000 years. Geology, archeology, anatomy, industry, intentions and habits of our ancestors teach us much, but above all paleontology, the branch of natural science, which treats of fossilized organic remains; the science of the innumerable fossil bones, found everywhere, together with the fossils of plants which have existed upon this earth since the well-preserved fossil-plants of the coal-measures flourished more than 30 million years ago!

The later iron age (La Tène culture) in Europe, touching the Roman history of Cæsar and Tacitus, took place about 2,000 years ago, while the earlier iron age, or Hallstatt, is accepted as 3,000 years past. The scientists can give you the exact figures of the duration of each of these ages in the different lands. The Bronze age extended back from 3,000 to 6,000 years in southern Europe and parts of the Orient. The later Neolithic age of finely-shaped and polished stone implements, and the Copper age in Europe, was about 4,500 years ago. The typical Neolithic age (Robenhausian and the Swiss lake dwellers) is given as 9,000 years past. The Azilian-Tardenoisian age of the upper paleolithic era, or the age of the common flint implements in Europe, is set at 14,000 years, and the Magdalenian age or close of Postglacial time in Europe is given as 18,000 years ago. The Monsterian age (Fourth Glacial Period) of the Lower Paleolithic era is estimated at 40,000 years, and the Chelleian age of the same era at not less than 100,000 years ago. That every land of the earth has passed through these ages is proven by archeology, ethnography, history and geography.

The ice age or Pleistocene epoch, the lower half of the Quaternary period of the earth's history, is estimated by the different geologists as of 500,000 to 800,000 years duration, and divided into the following eight parts: The post glacial time of 25,000 years, the four glacial periods of 25,000 years each, the three interglacial stages of 100,000, 200,000 and 75,000 years duration, making a grand total of 500,000 years. From the facts of the advancing and retreating of the snow line in the Swiss Alps of about 4,000 feet (altitude) down the valleys and up the mountains during the four glacial periods, the following extension in years of the entire ice age has been proven by Osborn, Reeds, Penk, Obermaier, Schmidt and others: The four great waves of cold, which happened 50,000, 150,000, 400,000 and 500,000 years ago, extend to the beginning of human stone culture in the warm forests of Pliocene life. The Trinal race of ape-men in Java lived about 500,000 years ago; the man of Heidelberg in Germany, found in a sandpit at a depth of 79 feet, lived about 250,000 years ago; the Piltdown man of Sussex, 125,000 years ago; the Krapina people in Austria, 75,000, and the Neanderthals of the Monsterian age from 25,000 to 50,000 years ago. This has been substantiated by the findings of corresponding fossils, organic remains and flint implements in the different deposits, drifts, gravels and moraines, and by our study of the many glaciers and caves.

The great grotto of Castillo, near Puente Viesgo, province of Santander, in northern Spain, was filled with deposits 45 feet thick from floor to roof, had 13 layers, covering eleven periods of industry from Acheulean times to the Age of Bronze in Spain. "This cave, repaired to and then abandoned by tribe after tribe over a period estimated at present as not less than 50,000 years, is a monumental volume of pre-history, read and interpreted by the archeologist almost as clearly as if the whole record were in writing. The first positive evidences of the use of fire are the layers of charred wood and bones frequently found in the industrial deposits of early Acheulean times" ("Men of the Old Stone Age," by Professor Osborn.)

About 25,000 years ago the modern type of man entered western Europe, and the local Neanderthal race disappeared. The emigrants came from the direction of Phenicia and were of pure Asiatic type. This Crô-Magnon race brought in the Aurignacian flint industry and a highly advanced spirit of decorative art. They were a nomadic hunting people and developed an extraordinary appreciation of the beauty and majesty of the varied forms of the grand animal life of the Pleistocene age. Their drawings on the walls of hundreds of caves in France and Spain are wonderful. In one cave in central France over 400 wall engravings have been discovered. Also excellent frescoes of animals of that period in four shades of color, many fine works of art and decorative designs in carved ivory, horn and bone, are found. The Crô-Magnons left descendants in various colonies in western Europe. A wave of the dark-haired, long-headed and narrow-faced Mediterranean race followed about 10,000 years ago and were succeeded by the Alpine-Celtic, Teutonic, Brünn and Baltic or northern Teutonic races up into historic time.

During the Glacial epoch or Pleistocene age the horse was an object of the hunt, as deer or antelopes are now. "Around the great Aurignacian camp of Solutrè, a village near Mâcon, Saône-et-Loire, in eastern France, accumulated the remains of a vast number of horses, which are estimated at not less than 100,000. The bones are distributed in a wide circle around the ancient encampment, consisting of broken or entire skeletons, compacted into a veritable magma, with which occur also remains of reindeer, wild cattle and mammoth, interbedded with all the types of Aurignacian implements. The majority of these horses belonged to the stout-headed, short-limbed forest or northern type, measuring fifty-four inches at the withers. The joints and hoofs were large, and the long teeth and powerful jaws were adapted to feeding on coarse grasses. The greater part of the remains are those of horses from five to seven years of age." (Prof. Osborn.)

In the National Museum at Washington is a monster Stegosaurus, a giant reptile, a most perfect skeleton of a lizard of the Jurassic age, about seven million years old. The fossil is nineteen feet long and eleven feet high and was found near Canyon City, Colorado, in the year 1885. The age of the Fall of Niagara is between 10,000 and 40,000 years. The gorge, which the water has cut above Lewiston, is 7 miles long, 600 to 1,200 feet wide and from 200 to 300 feet deep. There was a connection of the waters of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay with Lake Ontario until the Canadian country of lakes was obstructed by glaciers and the Niagara river started to flow. On account of tipping toward the west, in a thousand years the waters of Lake Erie will run along the Toledo-Cincinnati canal and Miami river into the Ohio and Mississippi and Gulf of Mexico.

The grand fall of the river Rhine in Switzerland did not exist until A. D. 960. The river used to flow past the city of Zurich, until the valley near Sargans was blocked up or raised and the water had to flow through Lake Constance and past Schaffhausen. The stream rushes thirty feet down and then falls sixty feet, which it has hollowed out in the last thousand years, as the Romans and old Helvetians knew nothing about this great fall.

Since about 200 years ago the river Kander near Interlaken in Switzerland has formed 230 acres of woodland, meadow and marsh into the lake of Thun. Since the time of the Romans the river Rhone has built more than two miles into the lake of Geneva away from old Port Valais. The maritime harbor of Adria near the mouth of the river Po in Italy was so important 2,000 years ago that the city gave its name to the Adriatic sea. The ancient seaport is now fourteen miles inland! The Mississippi river has built a delta of 40,000 square miles, and the silt of the Ganges in India has been found to be 1,200 feet deep. At Stassfurt near Magdeburg in Germany is a bed of salt 2,700 feet thick. It took over 10,000 years to evaporate this salt and millions of years to cover it in the present form. Of the animals of the Silurian age, which was about twenty-five million years ago, we know 1,300 kinds of Trilobites, a fossil crab. From the Trias, Jura and Limestone age, which was about ten million years ago, we know 6,000 kinds of an imperishable snail, twisted like a ram's horn, and called Ammonites or snake-stones.

The Grand Canyon of Arizona is forty times longer, thirty-five times wider and twenty times deeper, or 28,000 times larger, than the gorge of the Niagara river. It is remarkable that the Colorado river has done this work with less water than the Niagara in only five million years, and not taken fifty million of years to accomplish it.

If the Christians know so little and teach less about the history of the earth and men in the great past, how can we trust them with the instruction about the abode of the human soul in the totally unknown future? There are some signs of improvement, for instance the American edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica has fourteen pages on Religions, sixteen pages on Theology and one hundred and sixty-three pages on Geology! There remains for the admirers of metaphysics the urgent necessity to rewrite the "Holy Bible" along scientific lines, according to the facts of geology, paleontology and archeology! C. G. MUSKAT.

Final Conclusions Anent Spirits

"We are not here to inquire what we prefer but what is truth."—Huxley.

If we place spirits in the melting pot they evaporate.

Spirits—said to be discarnate men and women—must, of course, possess the form (external and internal) and functions of living men and women.

Such forms necessitate flesh, blood, anatomical structure, organs, brain, etc.

In the absence of this physical organism the form of man (except in art and imagination) is impossible.

Air, gases, the ether, etc., cannot assume the form of man, and are not sentient.

Man exists in this form. Body and form are cause and effect. Remove the one and the other vanishes.

Man, like all other animals, is a physical product of purely physical causes. He is born "like a brute" and—to use a popular pulpit phrase—"dies like a brute"—may be, if not in the trenches, in more esthetic surroundings.

But man thinks, reasons and invents, has hopes and aspires in higher degree than his remote ancestors. He clings to life, his home and dear ones; hence, since time immemorial he has cherished the idea which promised him eternal life after death.

We are prone to believe what we long for and what conforms to our ideas of comfort and happiness. Impulsively we reject the disagreeable, and without consideration accept, as truth and fact, that which pleases our fancy. That is why Mrs. Eddy's new religion, "All is Good," became and is now so popular. That is why Spiritualism was so greedily accepted: It promised to prove to the world and place upon a scientific basis, what Christianity has sadly failed to do, viz.: man's immortality, spirit communion with the living, universal salvation and eternal progress. And that is why most Christians now complacently reject hell, but tenaciously cling to heaven. They don't like to go to hell, hence disbelieve. They would like eternal bliss, therefore they believe. But these twin doctrines stand or fall together. They have the same origin, the same authority, and there is no evidence for either one. Science with its giant lenses has penetrated space for many trillions of miles, but localities where gods and spirits dwell have not been found. The great but pious Gladstone admitted: "Unless you accept the testimony of the Bible as conclusive, what evidence have you of God's existence and man's immortality?" This evidence our modern Spiritualists reject.

Well, in the great animal kingdom, composed of brutes greatly diversified, some brute must necessarily be the highest brute—and this brute is man. But simply because he has greater intellect and higher aspirations, this is no reason to believe that man is exempt from the inexorable and self-evident order of Nature which decrees: "That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have both one breath; so that man has no pre-eminence above a beast; for all is vanity. All go to one place; all are of the dust and all turn to dust again" (Eccl. iii, 19, 20).

As gods have ever been conjectured to explain cosmic existence and life, so souls and spirits were conjectured to explain the psychical functions of man and the "dual-man within man which survives death and lives forever." But gods and spirits do not explain anything; on the contrary, vastly increase existing mysteries. As Liebig said: "With an entirely incomprehensible something, some people explain that which is incomprehensible."

The riddle of all riddles, after all, is the existence of man without his physical body. To explain anything, act, performance, occurrence or phenomenon—no matter how inscrutable or startling—by attributing to "spirits," it becomes paramountly necessary to explain and place upon a scientific basis such spirits first. This spiritists have never done and never can do. Neither have the spirits of our most prominent departed spiritualistic friends ever returned to subject themselves to a scientific post mortem inquest or examination to prove to the world—that they seemed so anxious to do when still in their “grosser body” on this sublunar sphere—that spirits live after death; what they are composed of; what, in the absence of the physical body, gives them the form of man—sight without eyes, mind without brain and nervous system; life without circulatory and digestive processes, etc., without which organic life in its higher manifestations is impossible. When sap ceases to flow in tree or flower it perishes. When blood ceases to circulate in our veins we die. Without these life-giving processes life is impossible. How can spirits live without them?

What, indeed, is the mystery involved in the alleged feat of “an accordion flying around the room playing familiar tunes in light of sufficient quantity to be plainly seen” (why not in broad daylight?); “a chair dancing around the room and a piano playing without visible contact,” etc., when compared with the grotesque if not absurd proposition that man can live when all that made him a man has assumed other forms?

After this chemical process of disintegration of all the parts of man, what remains to fashion this hypothetical “dual man,” supposed to be indestructible during eternity?

To originate man Nature requires a hundred pounds or more of matter. After death can she make him out of nothing or out of what? This question Crookes, Lodge or Perry cannot answer?

If we can live during eternity without this physical body, why did Nature (or God) endow us with this “crowning work” for a few paltry years, and with it absolute proof that we are mortal, and not a gleam of evidence that we can live forever?

If we remove the wheels, springs, face and case from a watch and destroy them, we know the watch exists no more.

If we eat a fowl and a dog devours the bones, we know that is the end of the fowl.

The basis of life is the physical form, and the bases of mind are the dynamic chemical activities of this complex form which generate mind.

This we know, and common sense, science and reason prove it, because, in the absence of such physical form, the existence of mind has never been scientifically established, nor is it thinkable. Spirits made of air or the ether (a la Professor Lodge) can never satisfy thoughtful men and women as an adequate or desirable basis for immortal life.

There are no eternal forms of matter. All begin, all end. Man is a transient form of matter, hence not eternal. The humble atoms and electrons or the elementary energy (as they are now considered) alone are eternal.

And all is well. As it can not be a calamity that future generations do not live at the present time, so it can not be a calamity that we shall then be where they are now.

OTTO WETTSTEIN.

The Problem of Origen.

Twice again Mr. David Eccles has come forward (T. S. Jan. 27 and Feb. 4), after I had come to regard the battle as over, and when undoubtedly the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER were weary of the reiteration of evidence on Origen and Josephus. Perhaps had I not neglected to include in my last article the fact that Origen expressly says (Contra Celsum, I. 47) that Josephus did not recognize Jesus as the Messiah, the controversy would have been ended. I might add that this fact, taken in connection with Origen's thrice made citations of these minor interpolations, would seem to prove that Origen must have been the forger, and thus in advance of the major forgery of Eusebius', unless indeed these passages are later interpolations in Origen's works.

These undoubted forgeries of Origen are not the only ones which stand to his discredit. He, it is well known, added nearly 400 lines in half verses to the LXX text of Job; and after revising the LXX text of Daniel, and making two copies, all others were destroyed. To quote an authority on the subject, J. W. Burgon, in his “Causes of the Corruption of the Traditional Text of the Holy Gospels,” says: “Above all, it is to be inferred that licentious and rash editors of scripture—among whom Origen may be regarded as a prime offender—must have deliberately introduced into their recensions many an unauthorized gloss, and so given it an extended circulation” (p. 98). “The decrees of such a one as Origen, if there ever was another like him, will account for a strange number of aberrations from the truth; and if the Diatessaron of Tatian could be recovered, I suspect that we should behold there the germs at least of as many more” (p. 101). If, therefore, Origen is to be regarded as one of the most honorable of the early Christian fathers, what must the rest have been?

Falsehood, forgery, and all kinds of fraud by the early fathers of the Christian church were so common that it is difficult in our day to fix the responsibility upon any specific one. Origen, however, was addicted to that sort of thing and was not above what we have charged him with. In the Benedictine manuscripts of Origen, examined by Professor Drews and Prof. W. B. Smith, Origen admits specifically that Josephus does not mention Jesus, and he does not there quote Josephus in his answer to Celsus.

The fact remaining that Origen's manuscript of Josephus did not contain any allusion to Jesus, that all of the manuscripts of Origen do not quote Josephus as a witness to the historicity of Jesus, taken with the fact that at least some manuscripts of Origen contain references to the so-called minor passages attributed to Josephus, would certainly indicate that either Origen or another had inserted them in the manuscript of Origen's writings, which would thus antedate the writings of Eusebius. Mr. Eccles' citation of references to Josephus in Origen's reply to Celsus, unquoted by other authors, either ecclesiastic or profane, certainly demands an investigation by trained critics of ecclesiastical literature.

Perhaps attention should be directed to the fact that modern printed editions of Origen and other early Christian fathers, as well as of Josephus, Tacitus, and other profane writers, especially those published by, or under the auspices or at the instigation of ecclesiastical potentates or institutions, include all early forged interpolations and other modifications, without a word suggesting that scholars generally regard certain passages as doubtful. This obvious crime against literature appears to be silently assented to by the public, only a minority of whom know the difference.

Origen lived before the days of printing, and it was thus not difficult for him at any time to revise one of his manuscripts, to interpolate or add to any manuscript that he had previously written. Moreover, any such that he might have issued, duplicating his own copy, were available to him in the hands of his friends, the other Christian fathers. But we know that at least the Benedictine manuscript, preserved to date, is still minus these interpolations.

I don't know where Mr. Eccles obtained a copy of Origen containing the passages he quotes as the original reply to Celsus, which cites Josephus as a witness of the historicity of Jesus. But as biblical scholars available to me note its absence, I must at least conclude that the matter is not contained in all versions, and that where it does occur it is probably an interpolation by a later hand. We have knowledge of at least two different and irreconcilable versions of Origen already alluded to (T. S., Jan. 30), therefore I would like Mr. Eccles to cite the publisher of the version in his hands.

Mr. Eccles demands to know why Origen forged this “chapter,” and what was his motive? Origen could best have answered that, but we may be content with surmising that he forged the sentences in question for the same reason that he forged many others in substantiation of Holy Writ.

If Mr. Eccles wishes to hold that Jesus, the son of Ananus, who lived about the time of Mr. Eccles' hypothetical post-crucifixion existence of the Gospel Jesus, furnished a historical basis for the Gospel Jesus, I will not take issue with him. As we know that both Philo and Josephus were liberally appropriated in the fabrication of the Gospel Jesus legend, it is more than probable that the historical record of the insane Jesus, son of Ananus, provided a nucleus for the synthesis of the Gospel Jesus in its later humanized aspects.

That the minor group of passages in present versions of Josephus, alluding to Jesus, “give the lie to” or contradict the New Testament, does not prove they were not interpolations by Christian hands, as every Rationalist knows that the New Testament has been filled with self-contradictions, yet without proving that any of the individual irreconcilables were not written by Christian hands. The interpolations in Josephus were undoubtedly put there to substantiate the historicity of Jesus, regardless of what else they might be at odds with. It appears to be a case of the liar in general, who, after he has once digressed from the truth, gets into trouble progressively deeper, as he adds falsehoods to straighten out the original difficulty.

Mr. Eccles states that he has traced the followers of John the Baptist until the time of Paul. I infer he means to the date of the writing of the earliest epistles of Paul, which is now placed by critics at not earlier than 100 A. D. which is far later than the time of Jesus' alleged existence. I think all Rationalists can agree with Mr. Eccles that the historical John the Baptist never met the Christian Jesus.

There is nothing to prove that the James of the New Testament is the historical James the Just; and of the Jameses of the New Testament there are several who cannot be identified nor distinguished from one another. James as the brother of Jesus has no standing. Professor Drews regards him as not even an apostle or disciple, but one of the seventy missionaries who were called brothers. Origen wrote that James was called the brother of the Lord, not so much on account of blood relationship with Jesus, or because he had grown up with him, as because he was faithful and virtuous (Contra Celsum, I, 47). We therefore cannot count on any relationship with any distinctive James for fixing historical or chronological relationships.

I cannot agree with Mr. Eccles that proving the Origen reference to Jesus in Josephus a forgery invalidates the whole of Josephus. The very way it was introduced, by adding a few words to a sentence (see my article of Jan. 20), shows the general text was not mutilated. I protest we must not fabricate theories to fill up gaps in defective legends. Let us allow them to stand defective as they are, but as far as possible study out their origin and history as literature.

Having now disposed of James and of Origen's Josephus, I am interested to know which Jesus of the New Testament Mr. Eccles' theory holds to have survived to the approximate date of the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A. D. The gospel tells us of two different characters under the name of Jesus, which it fails either to distinguish apart or identify as the same. In fact, in many respects the two are incompatible and even irreconcilable. I will discuss them later.

HOMER WAKEFIELD, M.D.

Religious Variety Shows.

Several weeks ago, John Haynes Holmes preached an interesting sermon on the modern view of Jesus as expressed in “The Brook Kerith,” in the preface to “Androcles and the Lion” and “The Syrian Christ.” He described Moore's view that Jesus did not die on the cross, but was resuscitated in the tomb and lived among the Essenes, and that when Paul met him there, Jesus was horrified to find that Paul had been spreading the doctrines about his divinity; and Shaw's view that Jesus went insane towards the end of his life. After the sermon, a man arose in the back of the church and called out loudly: “You have blasphemed the name of the Master; Moore and Shaw are liars.”

On January 31, in Old Trinity Church at the head of Wall street, at noon, the Rev. A. W. Jenks, D.D., of the General Theological Seminary, preached on the virgin birth, which doctrine, with the resurrection, is essential for “safeguarding of the miraculous and supernatural.” He explained that the son of Mary had no earthly father and that the “principle operating in the conception in the womb of Mary was God the Holy Ghost.” He laid especial emphasis on the fact that this was “a unique incident not to be found or even faintly paralleled in any other religion.” He said that the documentary proof was strong and could be consulted and that he would give a list of books to those who wrote to him. He continued by explaining that the virgin birth is essential to the integrity of God's scheme of salvation for man, and that the truth of the incarnation cannot be held without it, and that disbelief vitiates the resurrection, atonement and sacramental character of his life, and that, at all times, those who have denied the virgin birth have been held disloyal to Christ's church.

What can the less orthodox churches think of this statement?

At 124 East Twenty-fourth street there is a new sign, “Free Bible Lectures; Questions Permitted,” and a woman there has some answer to every inquiry, and really courts any arguments of Free-thinkers. She believes every word of the scriptures, but thinks all the religious denominations are wrong, and that Jesus was crucified on Thursday, etc. She certainly has all the clergy beaten for confidence in the Bible. Speeches in Madison square are her specialty.

The evolution of religion is now as clearly established as is the evolution of all other characteristics of life and of the universe. The same laws have controlled the development of all. There has been neither miracle nor revelation, but natural selection and the survival of the fittest have determined the form of beliefs as well as the development of natural objects.—Robert C. Adams.

On Trial for Blasphemy.

Michael X. Mockus, a Freethought lecturer, was invited to speak before a Freethought group of Lithuanians in Waterbury, Conn., last summer. He did so, and in the course of his lectures read from the Bible: "And God said, If ye eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, ye shall surely die." He remarked: "They did eat—and they did not die, according to the Bible. Now if the account given in the Bible is true, God is a liar." These words were taken down by a policeman, and Mockus was arrested and charged with blasphemy under the Connecticut statute, enacted in the year 1642, which reads:

"Every person who shall blaspheme against God, either of the persons of the Holy Trinity, the Christian religion, or the Holy Scriptures, shall be fined not more than one hundred dollars, and imprisoned in a jail not more than one year, and may also be bound to his good behavior."

Mockus was tried and found guilty. An appeal was taken for a new trial, and this appeal was argued before Judge Francis J. Reeves of the district court early in December. The hearing was almost concluded when Theodore Schroeder, the free-speech attorney, heard of it, and hurried in from Cos Cob, Conn. After a conference with Mockus' attorneys, permission was asked for Mr. Schroeder to re-argue the appeal. The permission being granted, Mr. Schroeder proceeded to attack the constitutionality of the statute. The case was then taken under advisement, and decision on the constitutional points raised by Mr. Schroeder will be rendered in the spring term.

Mr. Schroeder's argument is especially interesting, forming as it does a model for legal attack upon the various antiquated statutes which we inherit from previous centuries, and which, though they are generally unenforced, may at any time be revived by the reactionary elements of society as a weapon against their foes—as was done in this case by the Catholic priests of Waterbury.

It was pointed out by Mr. Schroeder that the word "blaspheme" in the Connecticut statute of 1642 was to be understood as the lawmakers of 1642 meant it to be understood. Then by a résumé of the ecclesiastical and legal situation in the seventeenth century, both in America and in England, he showed that this statute was founded upon and intended to conserve the identity of church and state which then existed, but which was in later times formally abolished by the Constitution of the United States.

He showed moreover that this statute, as understood by those who framed it, made punishable such heresies as the opinion that "witches" should not be killed, or even the doubt that there is such a thing as witchcraft—two beliefs which have the authority of the Bible behind them; in fact, as understood by the men who made the statute, it included as blasphemous the rites of the Roman Catholic church, so that the priests who pressed the charge and testified against Mockus could themselves have been punished under its provisions. This was made clear through an elaborate examination of colonial documents.

If this seventeenth century statute was aimed at all who did not share the peculiar views of the Hartford colonists as to what Christianity was, and what constituted blasphemy against it; and if it was intended, moreover, to punish the enemies of Christian religion as being thereby enemies of the state; then the statute is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, which disestablished the Christian religion and established the freedom of speech on all subjects, including that of religion. The statute should therefore be held unconstitutional. Such, in brief, was the argument made before Judge Reeves. Those who are concerned about the preservation of our constitutional liberties will await with deep interest the judge's decision. There is no doubt that, if the constitutionality of the 1642 statute should be upheld, the precedent would be used by reactionaries in a desperate attempt to suppress the liberties of utterance which we now customarily enjoy. It is to be hoped that the decision rendered will be such as to make unnecessary the renewal of a bitter conflict.—F. D., in the Masses.

A Bill to Repeal the Blasphemy Law.

As a result of the free speech campaign conducted by Theodore Schroeder and arising from the Connecticut blasphemy case in which he is retained as counsel, a bill to repeal the blasphemy statute of 1642 has been introduced into the legislature of Connecticut. A hearing will be had on the matter on February 22, when Mr. Schroeder will address the committee having the bill in charge. He will also make Hartford his place of residence until the repeal comes to a vote, in order that he may at all times be on hand to confer with the advocates of the measure. Mr. Schroeder says he is curious to know whether there will emerge from the ranks of the Connecticut clergy some champion of the blasphemy law to defend this antiquated statute. He will not be backward in meeting such a champion if one appears.

Chat from Chicago.

Those were famous lectures delivered by Francis Neilson, M.P., before the Chicago Rationalist Association. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER would have said they were "humdingers." He cannot define the word nor can I, but it has its own excuse for being and needs no definition. It is a delightfully funny word and puts one in a good humor at once.

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good." So the great war is beneficent after all. It has blown over to us the great speakers from England, as witness Francis Neilson, Joseph McCabe, Scott Bennett, etc. England has little use at present for any but the "man with a gun." Francis Neilson was the sensation of the hour, and a stunning figure on the platform was he. The war has not yet bereft him of the gladdest of "glad rags" you ever set your eyes on. It takes a fine figure of a man to get into a swallow-tail and get away with it. He is tall, but not thin—svelte, would you say? He needs no artificial aids to beauty. I'm sure he wears no symmetricals, and that his tout ensemble is all his own. And just to think this handsome man with raven-black curly hair was a member of the British parliament from 1910 to 1915. But what is vastly more important, and that gives us Chicago people tremendous prestige, is that this dandy man, speaking from our platform, has actually backed out of the presence of her royal 'ighness, the Queen of England. It is too much! I was never so proud in me life. Just for his appearance alone, the queen ought to have made him a knight of her Garter.

Neilson's speech is perfection in the use of the English language—I should say British language, for I nowhere hear its like in America. Perish the thought that he ever drops his h's. My word, but he is a talker, and witty as they make them. He finds it more expensive living in America, and it's worth it, too, for in peaceful America he is sure of his job for some time to come. His grand and glorious diction is far beyond my humble pen and memory to transcribe.

I don't suppose there's any man in this country who can handle the Single Tax question so ably as Francis Neilson if we except only our little Pacific coast giant, Walter Thomas Mills. Did you ever see Mills? No! You've missed it! He is four feet ten inches in his shoes, even counting his high-shouldered hair.

Percy Ward's handling of the sale of THE TRUTH SEEKER last Sunday is something to remember. And he's always witty, is Percy. He cited the Congressional Record article. Referring to the prayer printed therein, he said, "Think of the impossibility of God giving Congress wisdom!" Even a "Blind Chaplain's Daily Oblation" fails to induce God to tackle so huge a task.

John Remsburg's "ears must have burned" as Ward proceeded with his subject, "Was Lincoln a Christian?" In fact the speaker never could have gotten through without the aid of Remsburg's unanswerable arguments in his great book on Lincoln. "Lincoln went to church to mock and came away to mimic." Such is the real truth. What an injustice it is that the press does not, will not, report the really worth-while matter that is constantly heard from our many Rationalist platforms! Page after page is given to religious and political trash. Sermons by liars about Lincoln command big space in all the dailies. I sometimes doubt if "the world do move."

Ward called attention also to L. K. Washburn's front page article in the paper, "If Jesus Came to Boston." L. K. ought to get down on his narrow bones and implore God to send more Percy Wards to suffering humanity.

After the happy booming of THE TRUTH SEEKER every copy was sold, even the one Ward held in his hand. If Ward would only listen to sound sense he'd quit the ill-paid platform and go to peddling Freethought literature to cover the high cost of living. LIBBY C. MACDONALD.

Saved and Lost.

"Where is the soul of Snooks?" St. Peter cried: "Bill Sunday saved it or I wouldn't mind it." "His soul is lost!" the angel clerk replied; "His soul's so small that nobody can find it."

CAYUGA.

Trouble With God.

A story is going the rounds about a French officer who died and applied at the gates of heaven, where he was warmly greeted by St. Peter: "Entrez, mon brave. Is there anyone here that you would like to see?" "Yes," said the Frenchman, "I should like to see Jeanne D'Arc." "Sorry," replied St. Peter, "she is at Verdun, inspiring the French troops." "Ah," said the officer, "then I should like to see Napoleon." "He is not here either; he is at the Somme, inspiring your troops also." "Then," said the French officer, "let me see God." St. Peter scratched his head and confessed: "We are having trouble with God. He is at Berlin; he thinks he is the kaiser."

St. Peter is not the only one, nor is heaven the only place, that is having trouble with God. From the time that Adam and Eve were prohibited from eating of the tree that would give them too much knowledge; through the days that he ruled so inefficiently from Olympus; through the middle ages when he was robed in a blue wrapper and peered through the clouds created by the artists, on to the present time when he is said to approve of war, he has been giving trouble. Every few generations, there is a rumor that he has been corraled, but subsequent investigation has always proved that he was not on Mount Horeb, nor on Olympus, nor in heaven, nor in Palestine. His anthropomorphic, trinitarian personality has been lost in theological, esoteric, presumptuous rodomontade. He has been credited with being in all places at once, and a loving father to the soldiers in both trenches, but is so keen for glorification and praise not due to him that he appears to be rather unintelligent; in fact, Mary Monico might say he was a woman, and if that theory is retained, there will be a splendid opportunity for L. K. W. to invent more crisp aphorisms, while G. E. M. forgets that anyone ever heard of God and devotes his attention to turning out a better paper each week and being himself the deus ex machina.

Any God that has ever been described is a myth, but on the other hand, it is almost as difficult to conceive of a force that arranged the planets in the firmament and started the evolution that constantly produces new wonders upon earth. Reason does not always reach the whole truth, and science has often been mistaken. In the early years of most of us, it would have been good reasoning to state that no one could see through a solid board one inch thick, or to denounce as a charlatan the man who claimed that he could send a message across the ocean without wires. Facts do turn out to be contrary to the best reasoning of man, just as the fact of a personal God who answers prayer has been proved not to exist; but there is certainly something in man that is not yet understood and that impels him for good or evil, call that intangible quality what we may. If God is an abbreviation of good, we can all seek for it, and if Devil is a corruption of evil, we can all shun it. A. M.

In some Ohio cities the attendance at the Paine celebrations was lessened by members of Rationalist societies being under constraint to attend celebrations of the birthday of President McKinley, which falls on the same day, January 29. It is conceivable that in the course of time the anniversary meetings of Paine and McKinley will be combined. By doing so the memory of Mr. McKinley will be longer perpetuated.

NOTES AT LARGE.

We have read a number of Lincoln day sermons without being specially disturbed, but our equanimity is threatened by the deliverances of the Rev. Dr. Charles Edward Locke, a Methodist minister occupying a pulpit in Los Angeles, who had the hardihood to relate as a matter of fact the story of Lincoln's conversion by a parson of the same denomination. We subjoin it as a contribution to Lincoln mythology, of which there is a large body:

"Mr. Lincoln was about thirty years of age and had just taken up his residence in Springfield, Ill., for the purpose of practicing law. It was in the year 1839. The pastor of the Methodist Church was the Rev. James F. Jacques, afterward the colonel of the Seventy-third Illinois volunteer infantry during the Civil War. This responsible preacher-soldier says that one Sunday morning a boy came to his parsonage to inquire whether he was to preach as usual, explaining that Mr. Lincoln had sent him. The minister replied jocosely to the boy to tell Mr. Lincoln to come to church and find out for himself. Whereupon the lad said he had been promised a quarter if he would secure the information. The kind-hearted preacher of course helped the boy to get his money. When Mr. Lincoln arrived at the church he was accompanied by Governor French and wife. The church being crowded the distinguished party were seated inside the chancel.

"The preacher's subject was 'Ye must be born again!' It was a strong, earnest sermon and Mr. Lincoln listened with absorbing interest. One night shortly afterward, like Nicodemus, he called to see the minister, and said he had been profoundly impressed by the Sunday morning sermon. Mr. Jacques says that Mr. Lincoln remained at his home for hours in conversation, and at length, after much counsel and earnest prayer, Mr. Lincoln accepted God as his father and Jesus Christ as his savior. Let me use the preacher's own words: 'I have seen many persons converted; I have seen hundreds brought to Christ, and if ever a person was converted, Abraham Lincoln was converted that night in my home.'

In Remsburg's "Abraham Lincoln" mention is made of five occasions when it was claimed that Lincoln accepted Jesus, but this does not appear to be one of them. The parsons make him out to be a repeater, a backslider, one who had the habit. And yet in Dr. Holland's Life of Lincoln, where all that is said about his religion has the purpose of proving him to have been a believer, we find him confessing to the Hon. Newton Bateman, "Mr. Bateman, I am not a Christian." That was in 1860, when he was fifty-one years old; and the Rev. Mr. Locke's preacher-soldier had converted him twenty years before! The half-dozen clergymen who affirm the conversion of Lincoln involve one another in many lies and have their dates hopelessly tangled, as generally occurs when fictitious events are concerned.

The following is sent out from Philadelphia under date of February 11:

"Postal routes of 3,500 years ago, when the parcel post and the circulating library already had been in existence at least 800 years, are shown on the world's oldest map, discovered in the University Museum's Nippur tablets by Dr. Stephen Langdon, the Orientalist from Oxford University. Announcement to this effect was made to-day, and it was said that Dr. Langdon considered the map not only the oldest but the best preserved that has come down from antiquity.

"Dating before the time of Abraham, the map shows a comprehensive survey of the region about the temple of Nippur, and indicates that the country was under a high state of intensive cultivation. Canals were numerous and served both for irrigation and transportation. They were the mail routes and a tag has been found for a basket of 'books' or literary tablets sent from the library of the Nippur Temple to a town about six miles distant, Shuruppek. According to Babylonian tradition, Noah lived at this town and built the Ark there. The tag was used about 2300 B. C."

The introduction here of Abraham as a key to the date of the map is probably the work of the editor of the dispatch. We doubt that it throws any light on the matter, since apart from the marginal numbers in the old-fashioned Bibles, which locate Abraham at 1900 B. C., the time of that mythical Arab sheik is an unsolved problem. At least the writers in the Encyclopedia Biblica, who concede much to the destructive criticism that throws the story aside as an outworn and useless myth, do not venture to give the father of the faithful a date. But allowing the date to stand, and admitting that Abraham was the contemporary of the map-makers, it shows that the Babylonians were enjoying an advanced stage of civilization when the progenitor of God's chosen people lived in a tent and subsisted by driving his herd of cattle from one feeding ground to another, and adding to his prosperity by recommending the attractions of his wife to the notice of local rulers.

An attempt to deprive some naturalized citizens of their citizenship because they had violated the Sunday law by doing business on that day was recently made in the federal court at Chicago, where Judge Landis presides. After District Attorney Boddie had quoted the law in vain, the following occurred:

"Your honor," said Mr. Boddie, "there is a law even beyond the statute books—a higher law—that may be taken into consideration here."

"What's that?" demanded the judge.

"The Bible, your honor," was Mr. Boddie's reply. "It says that no work should be done on Sunday."

"O," said the judge, "that's it, is it? Well, we need not go into Bible law here. If we did, the president of the United States would be disfranchised, Congress would be arrested, scores of respectable people would always be in jail, everything would always be all tangled up, and we'd be in a devil of a fix generally."

Judge Landis, before ruling on the motion, might have inquired of District Attorney Boddie for the instruction of the court, where he found in the Bible the saying that "no work should be done on Sunday." Does there still exist in any quarter the belief that Sunday is the biblical sabbath? In view of the stuff that is thrown from the pulpit regarding the Bible as the foundation of our law and jurisprudence, Judge Landis's opinion of what would result were Bible law invoked should go into the record.

There is a bill before the Texas legislature to penalize all kinds of Sunday amusements, whether free or paid admissions, reports the Houston Chronicle. But the worm turns. The editor of the Chronicle thinks this is too much, and cries out:

"Laws and more laws. Restriction and more restriction. Blue laws and purple laws. Silly laws, many of them; absurd restrictions, foolish attempts to curtail the liberties of the people, trying to force people to be good by rules that merely induce people to violate the law. Citizens who want to be law-abiding forced to become law-breakers. Amusements that are harmless, and that frequently keep men and women from going to worse places, put under the ban.

"Everything closed on Sunday, whether free for the public or paid for by the people.

"If we are going to have blue laws, let us make them blue as indigo. Stop the trains from running; make it an offense to be seen in an automobile on Sunday; close the hotels and restaurants; close down the soda fountains; shut the people in their homes; make sneaks and law-breakers of boys and girls; keep them from all harmless amusements; then see just what a race of sniveling hypocritical Pharisees the great state of Texas will produce."

The "sniveling hypocritical Pharisees" have been produced already, or imported, and apparently have been sent to the legislature to vex the law-abiding citizen with more laws inspired by their sniveling hypocrisy. Penalties under our system sometimes fall in the wrong place. We can imagine few men not guilty of actual crime who are more deserving to be put under restraint than these liberty-hating Sunday malefactors who want laws that will send everybody to church or to jail. They are the inveterate enemies of human happiness and the welfare of mankind. They have inherited from far-off brute ancestors the prowling instincts of the hyena mixed with the meddlesome traits of monkeys.

Last week the Rev. Father Gillis, a Paulist preacher, delivered an address in St. Patrick's cathedral, New York, on the subject of "free speech, free thought and free press." If those who attended expected to hear any confessions on the part of the Catholic church as to its gross delinquency in the past in according to mankind these natural privileges, they were destined to disappointment. The preacher, as reported, made the usual boast that the Catholic church has always been in sympathy with these rights of man, though he failed utterly to account for the multitude of men and women that were burned at the stake or otherwise destroyed by that church for claiming these very prerogatives. He hoped, doubtless, that his audience had long forgotten those severely criminal days of his church, and would think of the Roman Catholic religion only as it appears today in the midst of a civilization which it had no part in making. In his concluding remarks, however, he could not disguise the true animus of his argument, for he seemed to have left the impression upon all that the great and inalienable rights which formed the subject of his discourse, were to be enjoyed only under the guidance of the Papal church, and in no sense to the contradiction of its rights and dogmas. This was what was to be expected, for nothing else would have been sound popery. And yet that church wonders why all reasoning men are opposed to it and its life-destroying superstitions!

In a prayer offered in the United States Senate on February 8, Bishop Collins Denny of Richmond, Va., who appears to have replaced the regular chaplain for that occasion, addressed the following argument and appeal to those within the sound of his voice:

"And while we know, for thou hast taught us, that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap, and while our sins have been many, manifold, and heinous, gracious God, visit not on us the legitimate consequences of our own transgressions."

We need not inquire what "many, manifold, and heinous sins" the bishop has been committing, but we may remark that having committed them he ought not to do the baby act or try to dodge the "legitimate consequences," whatever they may be. He knows—having been told in advance, as he admits—that sins have penalties. He should have thought of that before committing them, and so have avoided placing himself in a position from which he can escape only by a miscarriage of justice. Dodging a penalty is immoral. The fact that an act has penalties is what convinces us that it is wrong, and a sin that has no come-back is to all appearances the same thing as a virtue. If he has wronged the widow, the forgiveness of God will not pay her, and neither will it reform him. More likely it will encourage him to do it again. Why does not the Christian when he prays demand that all virtuous acts shall be rewarded, and thus encourage them, instead of asking and holding out the hope to his fellowmen that sins may be committed with impunity, thus affording an excuse for repeating them?

Two notable messages from absent sympathizers were read at the Chicago Paine-Ingersoll banquet. They were from Mrs. Eva A. Ingersoll and John E. Remsburg. Mr. Remsburg wrote:

"POTTER, KAN., Jan. 30, 1917.

"From my home in Kansas, five hundred miles away, I send you greeting and in imagination touch elbows with you at your banquet board tonight.

"In honoring Paine and Ingersoll you honor the two greatest intellects America has known and two of the bravest champions that ever unsheathed the sword in defense of intellectual liberty. May you be inspired to consecrate at least a portion of your lives to the noble cause for which they fought and in which they won immortal renown. Fraternally, JOHN E. REMSBURG."

Following is Mrs. Ingersoll's message:

"I am very happy to know of the Paine-Ingersoll banquet, and regret that it is not possible for me to be with you. It is most appropriate that this event should take place in progressive Chicago, in the State where my husband so loved to speak and where in 1859 he began the modern American war on the infamy of superstition with his lecture on 'The Gods.' Had it not been for Thomas Paine he could not have delivered that lecture. Paine was the first to write 'The Religion of Humanity.' He planted and watered the seeds of independence, of union, of nationality, in the hearts of our forefathers, and he attempted by the purest means to obtain the noblest and loftiest ends. Paine and Ingersoll did a great and necessary work, and let us hope they did it once for all. And now to show in some small measure my gratitude to those who have taken part in this celebration, if Mr. Reichwald will pass among you a copy of the program and have you sign your names and address I will on each New Year's day send every one a greeting in the form of a sentiment taken from the writings of my beloved husband. With all my heart I thank you for the tribute.—EVA A. INGERSOLL."

For a souvenir of the occasion Mrs. Ingersoll sent copies of Edgar Lee Masters' poem on Robert G. Ingersoll, to be presented to the guests.

The last number of Mother Earth gives a list of birth control advocates who have been prosecuted. These are the names:

Since the list was prepared Mrs. Sanger has been convicted and sentenced to the workhouse. Dr. Reitman is out on bail, awaiting the result of his appeal. Meanwhile influential persons are bringing pressure to bear on the legislature to repeal the law which classes birth control information with obscene literature. Catholic politicians are expected to oppose such repeal.

After entertaining a delegation of twenty-four Catholic woman suffragists, Cardinal Gibbons gives the public to understand that he has not changed his views. This is not so important as the fact that many Catholic women are changing theirs.

LIBERAL LIFE IN LOS ANGELES.

From John A. Morris, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

On Dec. 31, 1916, the Los Angeles Liberal Club heard a good address by Charles T. Sprading on "What Rationalism Stands For." He showed the distinctive and positive difference between Rationalism and mere unbelief, the one being a positive philosophy of mental activity, historical research and scientific investigation, while the other was a mere negation or denial of religious superstition. He pointed to Carnegie as one who while himself a mere unbeliever in the religious doctrines of the day was not a Rationalist in any sense of the term, as by gifts of money to ecclesiastical institutions he helped, aided and abetted the church to fasten more firmly upon others its claws of superstition. For Carnegie to stand as a Rationalist he must donate his money to the cause of Rationalism, that by the publication of books of Rationalist philosophy and scientific merit the world may be more thoroughly broken of its religious habits of thought and metaphysical foolishness.

Sprading also told us that the Rationalist, being one of aggressive mentality with the activity of progressive life in his brain, was not satisfied with mere denial of all the superstitions of the ages. Nor was he one to crawl into a shell of mere intellectual exclusiveness and disbelief, but he becomes dominated by the idea of trying to help others to gain liberty of thought from the tyranny of churchly superstition.

January 7th was "Mark Twain" night, and while Mr. Sprading showed Mark Twain's great literary ability as a humorist, yet he also spoke of his work as a philosopher and a Freethinker. Judge Ryckman gave us a few thoughts concerning Twain's philosophy as evidenced in "The Mysterious Stranger," reading extracts therefrom which were much appreciated by the audience. Channing Severance also read a good paper upon the subject, while J. A. Wilson gave us some humorous philosophy of his own with regard to both Freethought and the merit of Mark Twain.

January 14 Mr. Wilson spoke on "What is Liberty?" showing that if one literally obeyed the injunctions of the Bible there would be no such thing as liberty, and that freedom of thought as we understand it today, would be only a figment of the fancy, a mere mirage of the mind, a dream of the imagination.

According to Mr. Wilson the biggest lie in the Bible is that verse which says that "the priests took no more money from the people." He also thought the most horrible chapter in all our Sacred Scriptures was the 26th of Leviticus.

Mrs. Henry considered that it would be a good thing for the Freethinker if the Christian didn't have so much liberty in trying to cause the children of the Rationalists to go to church and Sunday-school on Sundays.

Mr. Sprading made the closing address of the evening and stated that if the people of Europe had been free from god-worship and the superstitions of Christianity, he believed there would have been no war in Europe.

On Jan. 21 Mr. Sprading delivered his most scientific lecture, "The Scientific Method of Investigation and of Thinking," and the gist of it may be seen in the following words:

Thinking means originating, not merely borrowing what others have said or appropriating the thoughts of others. That does not signify that one has the power to think.

A mechanic knows that he cannot produce a perfect piece of work without proper tools. But the average person believes he can arrive at truth without any tools or system of thought. Just as the printer needs the alphabet and movable type to build up words and paragraphs, so does the thinker need correct principles of science and logic to enable him to establish truth. Principles are arrived at by a correct method of investigation. So we need both principles and method in the search for truth.

Now truth may be defined as knowledge of things as they exist. In order to know things as they are, it is necessary to use methods of investigation that have proven trustworthy by much experience. But what is the correct method for arriving at this truth or facts? It is the scientific method of investigation and consists of four steps, viz.:

First, observation of facts or things;

Second, classification of facts or things;

Third, experimentation with facts or things, and Fourth, demonstration of facts or truth.

The aim of science is correctly to describe the phenomena of Nature and to reduce these phenomena to mechanical life. A law of Nature is a correct description of the order in which facts occur on an observed order of facts. Science is what can be demonstrated to be true. Whatever conforms to facts is true. Therefore, a fact about an object is the truth about that thing. The purpose of the scientist is to observe and express the correct formula and order in which facts occur. When these formulae are found by invariable experience to be correct they are labeled "Laws of Nature."

Now we see that the constantly occurring order of events is a natural law. There is no relation between this and statute law. The latter is an artificial enactment, possibly with the intention of bringing about order in society. This is not the description of the order that is, but a rule to bring about the order desired.

On Jan. 28 the Los Angeles Liberal Club celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine, the author-hero of the Revolution, and Judge Ryckman, Charles T. Sprading and Channing Severance all contributed their quota of thought toward the event.

Among many other good things Mr. Sprading said on that occasion, the following are considered most a propos to the subject:

Thomas Paine was born on the 29th of January, 1737, at Thetford, England; and he died in New York in 1809, the year that gave birth to three of the world's greatest men: Abraham Lincoln, Pierre J. Proudhon and Charles Darwin. It was well that the world received this gift to recompense it for its loss.

Franklin introduced Paine to America, and Paine introduced himself to the rest of the world. He wrote four books that have profoundly influenced the world; their titles are "Common Sense," "The Crisis," "The Rights of Man," and "The Age of Reason."

In these books he advanced ideas that are still considered advanced by progressive people. Many ideas that he was the first to enunciate have been adopted since his time, and there are still many more the world must adopt before it is civilized. He advocated the abolition of chattel slavery in 1774. He advocated the abolition of war as a method of settling disputes, and he was the first to advocate a confederation of all countries as the method of doing away with war. When President Wilson advocates the same a century and a quarter later, it is still considered too advanced by many. But progress has been made.

No one stood with Paine then. Millions stand with Wilson now.

Paine was the first to advocate separation from England, and Washington and Jefferson admitted that they were convinced by his arguments. He was the first to write the name we are so proud of, "The United States of America." He also wrote the sublime sentiment, "The world is my country, all mankind are my brethren, and to do good is my religion."

In the French convention he advocated a constitution which, if adopted, would have prevented the Reign of Terror, and saved not only the life of the king, but millions of other lives and about twenty years of war. But the militarists were in control then as they are now in Europe, and nothing but blood and destruction would satisfy them.

What were his religious views He tells us, "I believe in one God and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life." He believed in revelation. He believed in special providence. He believed in immortality.

Some evangelists have said that he reversed his beliefs when he came to die. If this is true, then he gave up his belief in God, in revelation, in Providence, in immortality. If he accepted the opposite to what he had taught, then he became an Atheist and a materialist on his death-bed. That is, he changed at death from a believer to an unbeliever.

The fact is that his "Age of Reason" was his last testament, written in the shadow of the guillotine. Death had been pronounced on him and he expected it any day. That is why he gave this testament to the world from his prison.

Those who pretend great reverence for the statements of a man facing death have shown the greatest contempt for this one's views; and yet, sublimer thoughts were never uttered. A nobler man never lived.

Mr. Sprading stated that 27 years ago he had pledged himself to use every effort each year on the Paine anniversary to make the name of this great Freethinker more widely known and better understood. Channing Severance also told us that twenty-seven years ago the first Paine celebration in Southern California occurred in Los Angeles, at which he was the principal speaker.

It was Paine's clear method of expression that has proven his undoing. During the evening two points were strongly brought out, one, that because of his simple and effective style he was read and understood by the masses, for while others presented views as antagonistic to religious superstition, their thoughts were clothed in scientific verbiage and scholarly phraseology not popular with the average mind. Hence, they were not criticized with such antagonism as the deeply-maligned and much lied-about Paine.

Secondly, that had he not written his "Age of Reason" he might now be known, revered and honored in the same way as Washington, Jefferson, Franklin and others, whose names are in the United States' history-books. Paine's is not. But Paine recognized, what so many twentieth century radicals do not, that man may be economically, politically and industrially free, and yet if the religious bugaboo still possess and occupy his brain he is not really free, but only existing in the delusion of liberty!

Channing Severance brought out some pertinent facts as to Paine's mechanical ability and inventive ingenuity; and said that he went to France, expecting to be gone one year, to consult with French engineers concerning one of his inventions. That Paine was not "master of his fate" is shown by the facts that he was away fifteen years; and then returned to the country he had helped so much to free to find a chilly social atmosphere because of his opinions in the "Age of Reason." He was denied the right to vote, where he should have been considered the first citizen of the land.

At the close of his speech Mr. Sprading also brought out the fact that if Freethinkers wanted to believe in miracles, they could very easily show that Paine was "miraculously" spared from death three times; once, when the mark of death was placed on the wrong side of his cell door in the French jail; again, when he failed to take a certain ship and such was lost at sea; and a third time, when he was to sail on an outgoing vessel, but didn't, and thus escaped seizure by a British man-of-war.

So this evening was not only one of Freethought propaganda and scientific instruction, but of literary entertainment as well. Sprading certainly knows how to provide intellectual meat for the people!

DR. GOODCHILD, PROF. ADLER AND HELL.

From E. Thomas, Kentucky.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Satisfactory response appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 27 to a recent sermon of Rev. F. M. Goodchild of New York in defense of the necessity and existence of hell, which Professor Adler had recently questioned; but it occurs to me that one point was not made by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Your first quotation from the Rev. Goodchild's sermon follows:

"The Professor teaches a fearsome doctrine that would turn the world into a hell in which even Germany's ruthless philosophy would seem mild" (referring to Professor Adler's recent anti-orthodox statement as to the reality of hell).

Before referring to the omitted point to be made on this portion of the reverend gentleman's sermon, it is clear that he is guilty of a misuse of words in this quotation.

First, in the employment of the adjective "fearsome," for it would seem plain that the teaching that there is an orthodox hell in the "fearsome" doctrine, not a teaching, in denial thereof.

Second, it is not the philosophy of Germany that has been ruthless or productive of hell in Europe, but it is, as anti-Germans believe, the German people, aided and encouraged by their religion.

But the real point intended to be made is the implied condemnation of the Christians of the world contained in the reverend gentleman's statement; but the worst is not the implied condemnation of the Christian people by the Rev. Goodchild, but that the condemnation of that class is merited and true.

This implied and admitted condemnation is found in this quotation by an analysis thereof. When an advocate of the doctrine and reality of hell makes this particular kind of statement, and which is commonly heard, too, he means first that hell or the belief therein is a necessity—that is, as is supposed, a moral necessity. He must mean that at least many human beings would be ruthlessly cruel did not hell exist, or belief that it does, persist. Therefore, the natural enquiry is pertinent: What members of society are in mind as needing and receiving this pretended restraint, in order that they may not be ruthless criminals?

Undoubtedly, the class in mind is not such as share the views of Professor Adler. There are various shades of unbelief or unorthodox teaching, but the whole of unorthodox teaching is in large part centered on and is in thorough unanimity against the doctrine of hell. The unorthodox do not believe the hell doctrine at all; so that it cannot be said that the necessity of hell or faith in it is necessary to restrain from the commission of wrong and inhumanity the unorthodox class. Who, then, are so weak, so unbalanced, so immoral, wicked, desperate, cruel and ruthless as would create a worse than a German hell but for the restraining effects of it or faith in it? What class remains to be affected or intended by the Rev. Goodchild, and such doctrinaires as he, but those who do believe there is a hell or pretend to so believe—the orthodox Christians? There is and can be no other class. The reference in the sermon from which the quotation is taken is to the individuals constituting the orthodox Christians, and evidently Rev. Goodchild is an exemplar therein and thereof.

He and they, for the most part, are the very unthinking, uncharitable, illiberal, vicious men and women in whom inhere the wickedness and meanness to create ruthless war and hell, and they do create it, and are now in Europe indulging in it, and not the Freethinkers, not the unorthodox, for the last-named not only have no such restraint, but repudiate any supposed necessity for such restraint, and repudiate the existence of hell as a fact.

It is likewise true that at no time in the history of humanity or the Christian religion has the belief in hell restrained or deterred any Christian from any immorality or crime that he or it as a class willed to commit.

A PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

From M. Farkasch, Massachusetts.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

From my earliest boyhood till the present time (I am at the turning point of the three scores and ten) life has been a constant struggle; and even at the present I bear the harness, pulling the load for the sake of shelter and food.

A few days ago while visiting a friend I picked up a paper and, reading the heading, THE TRUTH SEEKER, I became interested and asked my friend to lend me one or two copies, which he gladly did. In all my time I have not seen nor read any Freethought paper; not that I did not care to read it. It was simply unknown to me, and therefore out of my reach. I enjoyed very much reading the two copies. There are more Freethinkers in the world than the church, and even than the Freethinkers imagine, even if the great majority of them by the force of habit or for many other reasons do not express their thoughts.

I was brought up on the other side of the water, strictly orthodox, which accounted in the main for my being deprived of my childhood. As long as my parents, especially my mother, lived, my burden was bearable; then the pressure and the contradiction became so apparent that I had to reach a turning point. At the age of 13 I lost my mother, a good woman, but restricted by condition to declare her affection for her children. Four years later I lost my father; he was killed by an accident. He was, as orthodoxy calls it, a good man. He was a hard worker, and, as the saying goes, his word was as good as his bond. He tried to do his best to feed and clothe, and to punish his children for everything that he thought was not right; but he never thought that a child craves for a kind word and affection. So my youth was cold and barren, with no sunshine. Every act in my life was interwoven with religion and the church, and I as a healthy, lively boy became the greatest sinner, so it was said.

I was about 18 years old and quite accustomed to the idea, when one early morning about 2 o'clock, as the Christian would say, I became converted, but not through Jesus or any other apostle or good holy man. My conversion took place through a wolf in sheepskin. I became the helpless witness of the most immoral, inhuman act committed by the most dignified church member. I saw the result, the suffering and injustice. Everything that was in me revolted, and I could, but dare not, speak; and even if I dared, it would not have helped.

From that time I commenced to think and to weigh and took the people for what they are worth in life to themselves and to other men. I brought up a large family in my way, uninfluenced by the church or Bible. I did not forbid nor encourage any of them. I traveled and worked all my life and learned to be careful in expressing my mind, for there is no room for Freethought without the seed of experience and self-thinking. However, it takes at the right moment very little to inoculate the seed which no Willy Sunday and thousands of his kind can remove. About two years ago I was in England, and in a habit for sake of experience to visit churches, and anxious to know a little more about the Quakers and their creed I visited their meeting place. The moving of the spirit interested me, however. I found that the spirit has always chosen the people who were best gifted to blow their own horn—and to predict hell to others. It made the first time the experience that such a thing as a spirit existed; and if he had not taken hold of me, to give the Quakers a good, sensible lecture I would not believe in his existence and his affinity to people who fail to express their thoughts. After the meeting, however, I was casually requested to control my spirits if they are touched by Satan.

"STOP THIS DAMNING BUSINESS."

From A. M. Huger, Florida.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I see in your issue of Dec. 30 a communication signed "L. K. W." on "Damnation," closing with the comment: "Is it not time to stop this damning business, or this damning religion?"

In reply to such a question, I would say this "damning business" has long been sanctified by the church, and derives its authority from the founder of the faith himself—that is, if the whole record from Genesis to John is not mythical.

The man who when angered or worried finds a certain relief in lessening the pressure on his boiler by opening the safety valve and letting some of the superheated steam escape, can find ample support for this, after all, not very dangerous diversion, in the biblical narratives.

Even Peter, the rock on which the church was founded, when charged with being one of the followers of Jesus, roundly cursed and swore (Mark, chapter xiv). Indeed, "cursing" might well be called the eighth "sacrament" of the holy Catholic church.

Many passages in the scriptures attribute to Jesus great humanity, benevolence, charity, and a temper so forgiving that if smitten on one cheek he would turn the other; yet, it is evident, where his own doctrines are denied, or his own disciples involved, he is vigorous and venomous not only in denunciations, but damnations; and that not merely of individuals, but of whole communities. The Inquisition was the natural and inevitable fruitage of such a faith.

I confess that when irritated or provoked I myself sometimes indulge in a few more or less impersonal damns, which, however, do not weigh very heavily on my conscience, as I realize they are less sinful than merely silly; and a little nonsense now and then may be forgiven even to the best of men.

Queerly enough, sincere and orthodox Christians, who are not always honest, truthful, and charitable, consider cursing as one of the worst of sins; yet if they will read Mark, chapter iii, and Matthew, chapter xii, they will discover that even cursing Christ will be forgiven, but blasphemy against the Holy Ghost alone is the unpardonable sin, though I believe this ghost was only invented some time after the famous council of Nicæa in 325 A. D.

In this case Jesus was less intolerant than usual, and apparently less disposed than usual to deny to others the privileges he himself claimed; but the scriptures clearly show that damnation, infernal and eternal, was one of the very cornerstones of Christianity; indeed, without the devil and hell as coadjutors, the early church would never have won many converts, though when it had attained to power the Inquisition was more effective, as no doubt many unbelievers preferred to be "converted" into Christians rather than to be converted into ashes. As to myself, I should certainly have dodged martyrdom.

As to the cursings of Christ, see as follows: Mark, chapter vi; Matthew, chapter xi; Matthew, chapter x. See also Luke, chapter xii, and the parable in Luke, chapter xix, and in others.

In Matthew, chapter xv, Jesus sneers at the Gentiles as dogs, unworthy of partaking of the bread of life; and if all of them were as cringing as the woman of Canaan, who replied to his contemptuous rejection, "Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table," perhaps he was not far wrong.

To my mind, one of the strangest things in the history of Christianity is that a race pretending to be the highest and proudest, should have accepted as their God and savior a fanatical Jew, who undoubtedly felt a supreme contempt for the Gentiles who have since become his devoted worshippers.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THEOLOGY.

From G. E. Shoemaker, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Enclosed is an advertisement concerning five lectures to be delivered by Rev. James H. Snowden, D.D., LL.D. (balance of alphabet omitted for lack of space), on the psychologic aspects of religion. I will make no mistake in guessing that the true mission of psychology will be ignored by side-stepping the ancestral handicap of conventional thought.

Religion has adaptability, cleverness, and experience, in obscuring truth, originality and human advancement.

Why not get some one to write an article for THE TRUTH SEEKER entitled "The Psychology of Theology in Relation to Logic and Morals," the effects of social, family and national obligations from biblical training, war and treatment of prisoners, slavery, adultery, bastardy from revivals, murder and insanity? Such an outline would also explain the antagonism toward the legal profession, as an efficient lawyer must rely upon the most accurate of reasoning processes, logic.

MR. JAMES P. WILLIAMS ILL.

From A. S. Williams, Massachusetts.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

This will advise you that James P. Williams, who for many years has been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, formerly living in Sunderland, Vermont, the past few years with his son in North Adams, Mass., suffered a slight shock on Christmas Day, and has since been confined to his bed.

Mr. Williams will be eighty-one years young on April 5th. The "good old age" Mr. Williams has attained makes his recovery extremely doubtful.

His mind is not affected. Always a deep thinker, and an explorer after TRUTH, he retains his keenness of mind, and looks forward each week to the receipt of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

An ardent admirer of the late Col. Ingersoll, he made several trips to different cities to listen to the beautiful theories of the "Prince of Orators."

One of his childhood schoolmates, Delia Olmsted, of Fitzwilliam, N. H., became Mrs. Williams on Aug. 29, 1866, and they were constant companions till April 30, 1915, when the wife and mother was called to join her friends on the other side of life.

CONGRATULATIONS.

From J. H. Foster, Cuba.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I wish to congratulate Mary Monico upon her production in your issue of Jan. 27. It is a clear, logical, masterful, conclusive essay that would ornament the highest type of review. But I fear that Mary will tire of her task as her opponents depend at last upon appeals to emotion and sentimentality based upon an individualism that reduces society to a mere mass of atoms without organic unity or organism. Her reasoning will not appeal to her opponents because it is upon too high an intellectual plane for them to grasp. Like George Eliot, she is the exceptional woman who has the power to see more of the world-problem than the great mass of her sisters.

Impressions.—Niece—Oh, uncle, have you seen the Williamses baby? Do describe it to me.

Uncle—Um. Ah! Very small features, clean-shaven, red-faced, and looks a hard drinker.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Edward Bliss Foote, February 20, 1829-
October 5, 1906.

This well-known Rationalist physician, philanthropist and writer upon medical subjects, was born in the then village of Cleveland, Ohio, February 20, 1829. This part of the country was then called the "Connecticut Western Reserve," being almost entirely settled by people from New England. On both his father's and his mother's side he sprang from Revolutionary ancestry. Upon reading the "Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin" when a boy, and discovering that the great philosopher had obtained his early education in a printing office, young Foote set his mind on becoming a printer. He served an apprenticeship of three years, during which time he was a student as well as a workman and acquired facility as a writer. He at once went into the newspaper business, editing a paper in New Britain, Connecticut. Later he became co-editor of the Brooklyn Morning Journal, the first morning paper published on Long Island. As a boy he had determined to become a doctor, and now, entering the office of a physician, he began the study of medicine. He soon began to practice, and further fitted himself by a career in the Penn Medical College, Philadelphia, where he was graduated in 1860. Moving to New York city, he was soon settled in a large and well-paying practice.

Dr. Foote was a reformer in everything and he soon saw that disease and sickness were the result of the ignorance of the people, who knew at that time nothing of physiology, anatomy or hygiene, and that doctors thrived on this ignorance. Against the opposition of other physicians, he determined to write a book enlightening them. In 1859 he gave the world "Medical Common Sense," which reached the sale of 200,000 copies. Later he incorporated this into a larger work called "Plain Home Talk, Embracing Medical Common Sense," of which 500,000 copies were sold. His last work was the "Home Cyclopaedia of Social and Sexual Science." In all parts of the world where the English language is spoken these books are to be found and they have been translated into German. He also published "Science in Story," in five volumes, and many smaller works too numerous to mention. For twenty years he edited The Health Monthly, which had a world-wide circulation. He was a pioneer in medical reform, and his ideas have been generally accepted by the world. He was an opponent of the "Comstock law," and in 1873 wrote a letter to Governor Dix urging him to veto it. His objection was that it prevented the giving of knowledge to the people regarding subjects on which they should be informed. For this, in 1876, Comstock using advice to a patient given by Dr.

Foote in a letter, caused his arrest and trial on the charge of sending "objectionable literature" through the mail. The doctor was fined $3,500. It was an infamous outrage, but such a case would be laughed out of court today.

Dr. Foote's city residence and office was at 120 Lexington Ave., but in his later years he spent most of his time at his beautiful country home at Larchmont, New York, on the shores of Long Island Sound, where he died at the age of seventy-seven, October 5, 1906. He was an honored member of many medical societies, as well as of other organizations. The tributes paid him at his death were numerous and have been published in book form, together with a sketch of his life. He had friends in all parts of the globe who mourned his loss as a personal grief.

Unlike many in his position, Dr. Foote never ceased to avow himself a Free-thinker. His purse, his influence and his home were always at the disposal of the cause of Rationalism. When a youth he joined the Presbyterian church. Reading Theodore Parker and O. B. Frothingham made him a Liberal Unitarian, and later consideration of the subject of religion an Agnostic. Dr. Foote had two sons, E. B. Foote, Jr., and Hubert T. Foote, both like himself honored and distinguished physicians. He has been well called "The Grand Old Man of the Medical Profession."

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

Feb. 18, Martin Luther died, 1546. J. B. Gough died, 1886.

Discovering Columbus.

During the recent campaign a Tammany leader on the East Side, a self-made man and one not entirely completed yet in some respects, was addressing a mass meeting of Italian-born voters on behalf of the Democratic ticket.

"Gentlemen and fellow citizens," he began, "I deem it an honor to be permitted to address you upon the issues of the day. I have always had a deep admiration for your native land. I venerate the memory of that great, that noble Eytalian who was the original and first discoverer of this here land of ours."

"Why, gentlemen, at me mother's knee I was taught to sing that inspirin' song: Columbus, the Jim of the Ocean!"

Whereupon there was loud applause.—Post.

True Pleasure.

"Major Rasher, I saw a man today who would like the pleasure of kicking you," said a friend.

"Kicking me!" exploded the Major.

"Kicking me! Give me his name at once!"

"I hardly like to tell you," said the other.

"I insist upon knowing," said the Major.

"Ah, well, I'll tell you," said the other.

"It's a soldier who's in the hospital with both legs off."—Tit-Bits.

No Other Way.

Mamma—"What made you write your name on the door, Willie?"

Willie (age 6)—"Cause I didn't have no knife."

The Tenement Home.

The walls are tall, the room is small;
Repugnant odors over all.
The stairs are narrow and quite high.
There is no chance to see the sky.
Although we're on the topmost floor,
We ventilate it through the door;
For though the window's open wide,
The other building's close beside.

But we don't mind it. Through the day
We are, of course, some miles away,
A-working at the factory site,
Toiling with all force and might.
And when, at last, at close of day,
We trudge upon our homeward way,
What if the room is dark and bare?
(We walk to save our street-car fare).

We only sleep in it, you know,
With break of day we're on the go,
Back to the factory site again;
Huddled together, crowds of men.
Men, we are called, but we seem like cattle,
Fighting our way, as if in battle;
When all we ask is a chance for life,
A home for our babies, mother and wife.

But the topmost floor in a tenement row
Is all that our meagre lives yet know.
A bleak iron bed, a table, chair;
A small cook-stove, the windows bare;
A thin, frayed rug upon the floor;
A towel with holes on back of door.
And this is home for such as we!
There's others know worse poverty.

They have not where to lay their head;
Not sure at night to find a bed.
Yet this is called: "Land of the free";
With equal right and liberty.
Give me the liberty to say
For my day's work what be my pay.
'Tis only justice that I ask,—
A living wage for well-done task;

And liberty for some few hours
To stimulate my mental powers.
I envy not the millionaire
The broadcloth, nor fine clothes they wear;
But what I ask for is Fair Play.
They want my labor, not my "say."
To voice opinion would be crime;
I should be slaving all the time.

And to what purpose? In the end
There are no chances to ascend
The road which leads to wealth or fame,
Or to a noble, honored name.
Only the routine daily grind,
Weighs heavy—makes ambition blind.

Depressed and dulled we stagger on,
Hating, yet loving, our tenement home,
The only home we ever know.
I ask, How long must it be so?

LOTTA HALL HEISTERKAMP.

On the Face Of It.

One time when Whistler was walking about London with a friend, he was stopped by an unspeakably dirty street urchin who asked him for a penny.

"How old are you, my boy?" asked the artist.

"I'm seven, sir," replied the gamin.

"Oh, no, my lad, you must be more than seven years old."

"Gar on!" answered the youngster pertly.

"I ain't no more nor seven."

Whistler turned to his friend. "Do you really believe," he inquired anxiously, "that he could have got as dirty as that in seven years?"—Everybody's.

A Friend in Need.

The charming wife of a French diplomat had never thoroughly mastered the English language. She was urging an American naval officer to attend a dinner, the invitation to which he had already declined. The lady insisted that he must go, but the young officer said he could not possibly do so, as he had "burned his bridges behind him."

The lady misunderstood the word.

"That will be all right," she exclaimed.

"I will lend you a pair of my husband's."—The Ladies' Home Journal.

The Good Scholar.

After her third day's attendance at school, Pauline was retailing at home stories of her classmates' naughtiness.

"That's bad," commented mamma.

"Didn't the teacher have to correct you?"

"No," Pauline assured her. "She had to speak to all the class but me this afternoon."

"That's queer," remarked papa, a bit suspicious. "What did she say?"

"She said," reported Pauline, "'Now, children, we will all wait till Pauline is in order!'"

It Looked So.

An Irishman who had walked a long distance, feeling very thirsty, and seeing a milkman, asked the price of a quart of milk.

"Threepence," replied the milkman.

"Then give me a quart in pints," said Pat.

Pat, on drinking one pint, asked, "How do we stand?"

The milkman replied, "I owe yer a pint."

"And I owe you one," said Pat, "so we are quits."—Chicago News.

Hollow Hopes.

"Never despair. Somewhere beyond the clouds the sun is shining."

"Yes, and somewhere below the sea there's solid bottom. But that doesn't help a man when he falls overboard."—Baltimore American.

Asking Too Much.

Bank Manager—"Now please understand, Miss Jones, you must make the books balance."

Miss Jones—"Oh, Mr. Brown, how fussy you are."—Punch (London).

Plain Enough.

Charles—"Eddie Brown's mother makes him go to Sunday school every Sunday."

Charles' Mamma—"Why do you say she makes him go?"

Charles—"Cause he goes."

The Careful Girl.

Caller—"That new girl of yours seems nice and quiet."

Hostess—"Oh, very quiet! She doesn't even disturb the dust when she's cleaning the room."—Tit-Bits.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

M. A., New York—T. W. Doane, author of "Bible Myths," died about thirty years ago.

J. S. JONES, Missouri.—When you see a quotation credited to "ibid," it means that the author is the same as the one last previously quoted. Having made two quotations from an author, you place his name at the end of the first, and at the end of the second you write "ibid," short for ibidem, meaning the same.

F. E. DAVIS, Minnesota.—It is Isaiah vii, 20, where it says: "In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head and the hair of the feet; and it shall also consume the beard." Recognizing this as a difficult passage, let us look it squarely in the face and pass on.

T. M. HERSHEY, Pennsylvania.—The passage that the young "sky pilot" denies is in the Bible at Deut. xiv, 21, and reads: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien." This is part of the revealed sanitary code which we often hear praised.

ANONYMOUS, Brooklyn.—You challenge us to publish something you send, and then you do not sign your name. When a correspondent does that, we know that he does not want a reply to his communication—does not want to know the truth. We conclude that he is either consciously lying or is afraid that the facts will dispel the ignorance which he prefers to knowledge.

FRED C. HARRISON, Pittsburgh, Pa.—The states of Pennsylvania and New Jersey have laws making it compulsory to read the Bible in the public schools. In Mississippi the state constitution provides for the Bible in the schools. The supreme courts of Wisconsin and Illinois have given decisions adverse to the Bible as a school book. We will print in an early number a piece from the Christian Statesman of your state on the "Present Status as to the Bible in Our Schools."

J. HULITT, Philadelphia.—The editor probably receives a hundred clippings or marked newspapers every week. He is always thankful to get them, and while he reads the articles brought to his attention, he is in a continuous state of regret that he cannot comment on more than a few of them. Here is one, for example, that tells of a pastor in San Jose, Cal., who while admitting unsanctified conduct involving a girl, contended that his soul continued uncorrupted by the "technical error of the flesh." We avoid moral theology since Tom Watson got into trouble by showing the position of the church on that subject.

J. L. PLOWMAN, South Dakota.—To organize a Secular Society, you call a meeting of persons interested in such an organization, elect a temporary chairman and secretary, and then appoint committees to prepare a platform or constitution and by-laws and for other necessary purposes. It would be well to communicate with Mr. E. C. Reichwald, secretary of the American Secular Union, 79 West South Water street, Chicago, Ill., for directions or suggestions. A satisfactory statement of the objects of a Secular society may be derived from the statement of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S Objects and Principles on page 122.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Crime and the Land Question.

It has been the custom from time immemorial to inflict upon criminals punishment equally as hideous as the crime committed.

There has been a growing tendency on the part of many to organize for a meritorious purpose seeking to remove an effect without touching the cause, and unless this Association is vigilant and carefully watches its movements, it too, will fall into the category of such movements, which, literally speaking, are placing the cart before the horse.

Our Association endeavors to prevent the execution of the death penalty, whenever inflicted; and to secure the abolition of capital punishment.

Why not hit the nail on the head and seek to eliminate the cause which is responsible for murder? Don't misunderstand me; therefore let me say in unequivocal language that I favor and urge, recommend and will work for, the abolition of the death penalty which has proven to be inefficacious. Now to strike at the core of the entire situation.

Crime is primarily due to the economic conditions which environ society. The State should not, and you should not permit punishing persons for crimes which society could prevent. Murder in no small number of cases is committed when the sole motive of the perpetrator was robbery. Robbery in many instances is due to idleness, want and poverty. Most men stay in the straight and narrow path until the pinch of poverty takes the place of opportunity, and crosses the threshold of their door. The problem which must then be solved is: How to eliminate involuntary poverty, want and enforced idleness.

Everything that man touches, feels and sees, comes directly or indirectly from land, so without land man could do nothing. If the land is not operated it means that men do not work, that food and raiment are scarce, in consequence of which society is thrown into a somnolence. Man must find subsistence somewhere, and somehow he will get it. Man will naturally stay straight as long as honest opportunities are open to him; close them and vagrancy ensues; possibly pickpocketing or robbery follows; the man once straight and honorable, once respected and esteemed, is now cornered. Life or liberty is the question. Arrest stares the unfortunate in the face; there is a loophole open for liberty, but the victim must be silenced, for "dead men tell no tales." Unhesitatingly and thoughtlessly and in a state of what has oftentimes been termed "momentary insanity," the man kills. Now he becomes the scum of society, he flies from law and order. Is not society and society alone responsible for this man's downfall? Is not society to blame for permitting some men to accumulate millions and slamming shut the door of opportunity on others? Why should society punish its own victim? Assuming for the sake of argument that the criminal is captured, he appeals to the courts and may, through some technicality or another be freed. Should he, perchance be convicted, he may then be looked upon more as an unfortunate victim of circumstances rather than one who justly deserved the punishment.

Had society been awake, this man could and would have had employment, whereby a living could have been made for himself and for those dependent upon him. He would not have become a beggar and then a vagrant, a robber and finally a murderer. If society punishes this man, how is society to repent for his downfall?

Every imaginable crime is primarily due to society. Murder, rape, robbery and arson are due to idleness. Had these people been employed, their minds would not have been inclined and they would not have had the time to commit such crimes as I have outlined.

Having pointed out an evil of the present status of society, I assume that it is incumbent upon me to name a remedy, and this I shall endeavor to do.

As heretofore stated, land was ostensibly created for the benefit and use of all mankind. As such no one class should have the right to monopolize it.

Men have been known to keep land from use for the purpose of speculation. Few persons realize that by so doing, the land speculators are doing an injustice to society. Society gives value to land and is entitled to receive the benefit thereof.

Now for the remedy. Place a tax upon land values (and idle land which is the result of the present tax system is largely responsible for idle men) which would at once force the land to its best use and offer opportunities for labor and capital. The use of land would give work to every man in the country. Building necessitates the employment of diggers, bricklayers, carpenters, glaziers, plumbers, electricians, painters and many other tradesmen. These men would spend more money and the cir-ulation of the product of their labor (in money form) would again cause the employment of men in every walk of life.

All offenses against society are primarily due to idleness. Idleness of man is due to idle land, which keeps men from work and gives to a few land speculators millions. You will, by an examination of figures prepared by this Government find that the social evil is prevalent in two classes—the very rich and the very poor. Why? They are idle, have no work, either because of lack of inclination and absence of opportunity, and thus resort to the lowest stratum of the animal instinct in man.

The very philosophy of the present form of civilization is founded largely upon the land question.

Remove the cause of enforced idleness, poverty and involuntary want, and you will then remove all the crimes that originate therefrom. You will find no necessity for capital punishment, for most capital crimes originate from indiscretionary environment caused by economic conditions.

I know that many of you will say that murder, for which the death penalty is inflicted, will not be entirely eliminated. That I am willing to concede. There are exceptions to every rule, but murder and capital crimes will be so few that the State will not find it necessary to resort to the infliction of the death penalty.

Society is to blame for the so-called "naturally born" criminal. The germ of criminality is apparently inherited by this sort of criminal. The percentage, however, is small and insignificant. Society should not have permitted the birth of such a child. Society should not punish its own victim.

Congestion offers a splendid opportunity for vice, for crime and for the education of the young along criminal lines. From the minor criminal who commits petty offenses develops the criminal who commits capital crimes.

Congestion is due to high rents, such high rents are due to the violation of the economic law of distribution, of supply and demand, and due to inadequate housing facilities, and an insufficient number of houses is due to the fact that the man who builds is penalized by the state by the imposition of a super tax on buildings, the creation of human skill, the product of labor, instead of that super tax on the value of land—created by no man, but by men collectively—by society.

Our present tax system is purely and simply grand and petty larceny, for it takes public property and gives it to private persons; and takes private products which are put into the public coffers.

Stimulate trade and activity and jobs will be looking for men, instead of men looking for jobs; and if men are working they will not commit crimes; for as dirt is misdirected matter, so is crime misdirected energy. The solution for crime is to direct man's energy along proper channels, namely, productive labor.

To endeavor to abolish capital punishment is indeed a most praiseworthy and meritorious effort, but remove, my friends, the cause which is responsible for that necessity.

LEO KENNETH MAYER.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Years ago a preacher said: "It is time we preachers quit lying about Thomas Paine." Rationalists have often stated that Thomas Paine was a suffragist. Repeated calls for proof have brought only one answer, a reference to an extravagant article in the Pennsylvania Magazine, apparently some young person's rhetorical exercise, which had no hint of suffrage in it. One might as well declare that it rained yesterday because some other one had said that it snowed.

A writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 3 said of Thomas Paine: "He advocated the rights of man on every occasion, not forgetting the rights of women." Rights of man means human rights; rights of women is understood by every one to mean women's right to vote, and it is so expressed by the writer quoted above, who repeats the false claim that woman suffrage is democracy and equality.

When a vast majority of men and women decidedly express their opposition to an important change in the government, and a few legislators at the instigation of a comparatively few people, do make that change, it is not democracy but oligarchy. That is what suffragists are united in working for by Federal amendment and state legislatures.

Woman suffrage is not equality. Women must be favored, but we of the majority think that government by women is no favor to anyone, but quite the contrary, and that in manhood government is the safety of the nation. Besides those things in which it is right to favor women above men, some women will always want more than their rightful privileges, and men will not deny them in personal matters. It will always be so, and this is one thing that shows woman suffrage is not equality.

To suffragists' unwarranted assumptions that it is just for them to rule though they are in the minority, and other false claims, they add arbitrary methods of forcing their undemocratic, unequal, unjust measure 'on our unwilling nation.

HELEN M. LUCAS.

INITIATIVE.

It was once the common opinion that an unusually successful man must be either a genius or a very lucky person; but we have learned that success is the natural result of continued effort in right thinking and acting. Man is made or unmade by himself. He gains nothing but by his own individual efforts. Each man must work out his own salvation, and we are, slowly but surely, learning the secrets of success. If we but try—if we but make a real effort and stick to it, we can better ourselves mentally, morally, physically and financially. The power is in each of us. We have this power within us. We carry it about with us always, yet but few of us have learned to use our minds to advantage.

In this country we now have many millionaires, most of whom have risen from poverty to power through their own individual efforts. A man should make up his mind to better himself in every way possible. He must make up his mind what he wishes to accomplish and set out to be developed only by effort and practice. It is necessary to think strongly, venture boldly and accomplish masterfully. Do not wait! Begin today to do everything better and let nothing stop you! This may be one of the most important days of your life if you will but try to make it so. Try to make it the first of many successful days. At the end of every day, every week, every year, there should be a definite gain. If not, why not?

All achievements are the result of definitely directed thought, and you can attain your goal, as other have attained theirs, if you will think, plan and work intelligently. All successful men have started in a small way, keeping at it, slowly but surely, gradually accumulating more and more, until success was finally attained. It is not the business, but the man, that makes success. What you gain is simply the sum of your efforts.

Shakespeare has said: "All the world's a stage and men and women merely players." We should select a good part and play it to the very best of our ability. As we see the actors going through their parts on the stage and in the moving pictures, so should we endeavor to play our parts on the stage of life. Do this and you will find the curtain of life rising on a new career for you. A bright new day will dawn; the sun of a new life will rise, spreading rays of hope and joy over all as you travel on the new way to fortune. Every day has its opportunities if we will but play our parts intelligently and energetically.

Many of us are under the domination of a set of habits. They control us automatically, frustrate good intentions, and keep us from gaining the goal of our ambition.

What can be done? Many things can be done. But dreams will not do it. Wishes will not do it. It takes backbone, not wishbone. Bad habits can be overcome. But it takes thought and action. You must become the master and take things firmly in hand. You must have a definite object in view, guide things aright, manage affairs with prudence and intelligence, study carefully all details, simplify, improve. Eliminate all faults, all leaks.

Every day has its opportunities; something new is constantly coming up and we must be on our guard, ready to handle opportunities advantageously as they appear.

You must get the habit of being optimistic, aggressive and determined. This is a habit which can easily be acquired, cultivated and strengthened by systematic effort, and it brings results.

We are prone to lie a-bed until the last moment. This and all other forms of indolence must be resolutely overcome. We should, and can, get away to a good start and keep out in front. In the business world there is a premium on initiative. In every line of work it is the man with initiative who gets to the front.

Now I want you to consider very carefully the value of time. It is our greatest inheritance. You have so many minutes and so many hours a day. They come silently, unceasingly. You cannot stop them or change them. Positively and absolutely, you must use them as they come. When you lie a-bed in the morning, or idle away your time, the precious moments are slipping by with every tick of the clock—they are gone and forever! Now how many idle moments will you let slip by today? The events of a single hour may mean a disaster or a fortune and it is up to you to make or mar your fortune.

Many people eat to excess. It is a heavy load physically and mentally and heavy drain financially. Fewer and lighter meals, with the food carefully selected with due regard for your real requirements, would be better for you.

We should be thorough in everything we do. Lack of thoroughness keeps many people down to a mediocre existence. When we do one thing carelessly, we soon do all things carelessly, thus weakening ourselves and our prospects, and unconsciously sinking lower and lower in the scale of efficiency and, unfortunately, we seldom realize our shortcomings.

Make your life a continuous progress, taking up slack, shortening running time, remedying defects, watching for and adapting worthy improvements.

We can make ourselves greater and stronger. All that is required is initiative and determination. We all have the same elements of success in us, if we will but develop them and apply them intelligently. You will succeed according to your effort intelligently applied.

There is no joy or comfort in being a poverty-stricken mental cripple, lacking food, work, warmth, home and friends. The only difference between success and failure is mental development. We all have practically the same brain power if we will but learn to use it rightly.

So wake up and make a start right now. Do not let anything deter you from your course; remember, your possibilities are limitless. We are on the eve of a great commercial boom and the opportunities will be greater than ever. The race is open to all.

Positively refuse to be held down by environment. Start right now to rise above it. Make every effort a successful effort, a stepping-stone to something better, and you will find yourself slowly but surely rising higher and higher all of the time. You will gradually overcome all adverse conditions and every difficulty will fall before you. B. G. DONAHUE.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Victims.—A humane society had secured a down-town show-window and filled it with attractive pictures of wild animals in their native haunts. A placard in the middle of the exhibit read:

For Effect.—Casey had been married only a week when he discovered that his wife, who had assumed control of household and larder, was inclined to be stingy.

He had been working in his small garden one afternoon when wife came to the back door and called out in strident tones: "Terrence, come in to tlay, toast, and foive eggs!"

Terrence dropped his spade in astonishment and ran into the kitchen. "Sure, ye're only kiddin' me," he said.
"No, Terrence," said the wife; "it's not yet; it's the neighbors I'm kiddin'." —Everybody's.

A Fable for Critics.—The sole survivors of two wrecked ships lived on adjacent desert islands. After many years one of them managed to construct a catamaran and sailed over to the other island. He was met on the beach by Survivor No. 2. No. 2 took a look at the visitor, and then thoughtfully heaved a dolomite at him. No. 1 accepted the challenge, and replied with a similar bit of applied geology.

Then they fit all over the place.
After a while, exhausted, they stopped to rest.

A brilliant idea came to No. 1. "Why not," he said, "cease fighting, and help each other gather coconuts?"

No. 2 considered the proposition.
"Your idea has great Literary Merit," he replied. "But I am sure it is impractical. It sounds to me like only an Iridescent Dream."

"I guess you are right," sighed No. 1. "I have always heard that you can't change Human Nature, and that we must Face Facts, and not be misled by the Utopian Visions of Amiable Pacifists. But my idea did seem rather reasonable until we remembered all these things."

Then they went to it again; and very soon the sand-crabs were quarreling over their whitening bones.—H. C. H., in The New York Tribune.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

GOD AND THE CHILDREN.

The Harm of Teaching to the Young the Race's Discarded Notions of a Deity.

BY PROF. JAMES H. LEUBA.

Professor Leuba, who lately so startled the orthodox with his book of "Belief in God and Immortality," based on the opinions of men of science whom he had interrogated, has extended his inquiries so as to get at the conceptions of the deity held by children. His report and the discussion following it in the present article provide definite information upon the child's understanding of the religious teaching he receives, and the uses to which he puts the ideas he accepts.

SIX QUESTIONS were submitted to all the children of the Grammar School of a poor suburban community. Answers were written by all the pupils, and on the same day, under the supervision of the class teachers, who had been instructed to make no suggestion and to refrain carefully from leading questions. It was impossible for the children to confer with each other before answering.

Particular significance attaches to this report because it is based upon answers not from selected individuals within a group, but from every member of the only school of a community representative of a very large part of our population. In the 175 answers received, half from boys and half from girls, all between the ages of seven and fourteen, are included Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Baptists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Hebrews.

QUESTION I.—Who is God? What kind of being is he? Try to make a picture of him, if you can. Cannot that be done? Could a person that could draw well make a picture of God? Have you ever seen one? Describe God as you think he is.

In the answers to this question, God is described by about one-third of the children as "a powerful man" or "a human being," and by another third as "the creator." Less than one-fourth describe him as a spirit, and about one-tenth call him "our father." Occasionally he is spoken of as "a cloud," a "ball of fire," "an angel," "the son of the Jews," "the son of man," "the friend of every body." Characterizations that seem mutually exclusive, they often combine. Typical in this respect is the reply of a girl of thirteen: "God is a holy spirit. He is a human being." A girl of ten writes, "God is the creator of the world and our father and the most beautiful man in the world." Those who describe God as a spirit indicate usually in other remarks that they have no conception of bodiless spirits. And so, although they may have declared God to be an invisible spirit, they think that they, or a good artist, might make a drawing of him.

Many children drew pictures of God. The majority, however, hesitate to attempt this—some apparently because of a consciousness of artistic shortcomings: "I cannot. An artist can." (Girl, 11). "I could not draw him good enough" (Girl, 13). "Perhaps a great artist like Raphael can draw him" (Boy, 12). The question elicits also several answers like the following. "No one ever saw him. We draw him as we think" (Girl, 13). "They all draw by guessing" (Boy, 12). "They could only draw imaginary pictures" (Boy, 10).

To the question, Have you ever seen a good picture of God? a large majority answer affirmatively. One boy of twelve writes, "Yes, it looked like him." A girl of thirteen says, "Yes, it looked natural." Some reply that they have seen many pictures of him, but "We do not know whether it is good ones or bad ones we see" (Girl, 13).

The descriptions of God's appearance show the vividness of children's imagery. Pictures representing God as an old man, with long white hair and beard, white robes, and kindly face have contributed largely to their notions; but there are frequent departures from this conventional type. "God has a handsome face, black hair and whiskers, wears a white gown and wooden shoes" (Girl, 12). While almost always conceived under human form, he is differentiated from other men by superior beauty, stature, power, or even by his clothing. "God is the prettiest man on earth" (Boy, 8). "God is the creator of the world and our father—the most beautiful man in the world" (Girl, 10). "He does not dress like any other man." Other answers are: "A being infinitely perfect." "God is a Jew;" "He looks very kind and healthy." Beauty is a very common attribute, but it seems not indispensable to a girl of thirteen who writes, "He may be ugly and he may be handsome, but I know he is good, for the Bible says so." In no instance is there any evidence that God and Christ are distinguished one from the other.

QUESTION II.—Do you think of him often? When? Why?

Nearly all say that they think of God often. The more frequent expressions are, "Very often," "All the time," "Every minute." The meaning of these statements is somewhat defined by the answers to the "When?" They think of God when saying prayers at night and morning, in church or in Sunday school. Some say, "When alone," "In bed."

PROF. JAMES HENRY LEUBA.

The answers of the children to the question, "Why do you think of God?" help to define the content of their God-idea and the influence of that idea on their lives. The three most common answers are: "Because he made me"; "Because he is our father"; "Because he is good to me." Each one of these answers is given by about ten per cent. of the children. Others say: "He helps us along"; "He gives us strength and makes our brain work"; "I like him"; "I love him and want to go to heaven"; "He thinks of me"; "I know he will make me good"; "He loves us so." Two say, "He died for me"; one, "Because he takes our sins away"; and another two, "He redeemed us." In about ten per cent. of the cases, a definite ethical motive is stated.

The data are insufficient to permit the tracing of any relation between age and the character of the reasons given.

QUESTION III.—Where is he? Has he a home? What is it like?

More than seventy-five per cent. locate God's abode in heaven; five per cent. use the word sky. Nearly twenty per cent. say he is "everywhere." Ten per cent. think that he has no home; some of these give as explanation that he is everywhere, or that he is in people's soul.

The crude realism of their beliefs is often amazing. God's home is described as, "A large room"; "A big nice room"; "His home is all covered with grass"; "He has a lovely house"; "He has a nice place above the clouds"; "It is the most beautiful house on earth"; "He had a home in Bethlehem but he does not live there"; "It must be a grand place to live, it's up in the sky, invisible to the eyes." One writes, "It's a dismal place; it's in the clouds." Other answers are: "His place is where the sun is at, and where people go when they die"; "When we die, if we are good, we go to his house"; "I think his home is bright and fair, where no troubles or temptations ever come"; "It is a place of peace and rest and pleasure and it is in the sky."

The younger children speak in very positive terms; but among the older, a critical attitude is observable. "If he had a home, it would be in heaven"; "God is said to be in heaven"; "God is everywhere, but he is said principally to be in heaven where he manifests himself to the blest." Earl Barnes had already observed a marked difference in this respect between children of eleven and thirteen years of age. The latter often feel a need for placing upon others the responsibility for their statements. He quotes this carefully guarded answer from a girl of twelve: "Heaven is a place where you are said to be always happy, I think it must be very beautiful—It is said that the people who go there, who are angels, have wings and dress in white. Of course I have never seen them, so I do not know exactly how they look." These older children seem ready to entertain a less grossly materialistic conception.

QUESTION IV.—What does he do? Tell all the things you think he does. Has he ever done anything for you? Does he know and see you? If so, when?

God is mainly conceived as creator, controller of natural phenomena, and provider of food and clothing. About one-sixth of these children say, "He makes us good," or "He watches over us," or "He helps us." Only three do not know. Many give vague answers: "He does all things." "Lots of things," and the like. Here are a few typical quotations: "He makes people"; "He gives people souls"; "He makes rain and snow fall, and moon and sun shine, and flowers grow"; "He can make the world come to an end"; "He created holidays"; "He works in heaven, makes rain, snow, thunder, lightning." Several speak of him as sitting and writing everything in a book, of his sending people to hell or heaven, of making people ill or well. Others say: "He loves good people"; "He heals all people and answers their prayers"; "He gives us food and helps poor people out"; "He helps us when we are in danger of death"; "He puts good thoughts into our heads"; "He does all things to make us happy." One poor child, losing patience, exclaims: "I don't know no more. God does his duty and helps those who helps themselves. He keeps the devil from taking you and many other enemies."

In general these children agree that God has done something for them. When they do more than say, "many things," "many lovely things," "many good things," and the like; they speak of God as creator, as provider of food and clothing, and as protector against disease and accident. Some of the less commonplace answers are as follows: "He gave me strength and education to worship him back"; "He has given me the brain to do everything"; "He gave me a home and all the clothes I want"; "He gives many good things; he gave shoes, stockings, food, clothing"; "He cured me when I had diphtheria"; "A good many things; I have been successful in all my work and play"; "He has helped me out of many a fight I had and he gives me all my food."

QUESTION V.—Would it make much difference to you if there were no God? Would you get along just as well without him?

To the first part of the question, nearly all reply emphatically "Yes"; "Do not know"; two say it would make no difference; and ten per cent. give no answer. The difference that is foremost in their minds arises from their belief that God is the creator and sustainer of the world. "No God" would be equivalent to "no universe." They say: "We should not be alive"; "We should have no food"; "Nothing would grow"; "It couldn't rain or snow or shine"; "We should die of hunger and freeze to death." A small proportion are concerned for the ethical result. "I could not be good"; "We couldn't say our prayers to God"; "We should be bad"; "We should have nobody to worship."

Dominant characteristics.—These papers give proof of a shocking absence of systematic teaching.¹ Most of the information contained in them could have been "picked up" by the child in his non-religious surroundings. Nevertheless the majority of them are more or less regular attendants at Sunday school.

God and Christ are never clearly differentiated, and are usually evidently confused. It is "God" who is the "Son of Man," who "died for us," "saved us," "was nailed on the cross," etc. Only two mention the Trinity and only one, a Roman Catholic, uses the word "Redeemer."

The world of spirits calls forth very little dark and forbidding imagery; it is generally attractive. The child seems hardly ever intimidated by the powerful and mysterious God that he describes. The frequency with which esthetic qualities appear in the description of God is very noticeable. If he is never distinctly understood as an evil power, he is frequently credited with actions that would make him immoral. The dominant attribute of God in the minds of these children is his omnipotence. They agree that God can do everything; and, which is more important, he is usually regarded as actually doing everything; he can make one sick or well, poor or rich; he can cause rain and earthquakes, etc. It is hardly a matter for surprise that the child is more impressed by the physical prowess of the Divinity than by his moral goodness.

There is danger of greatly overestimating the role played by God in the lives of these children. One of the impressions left by the reading of their papers is that of the shallowness of their belief in God. Although he is usually said to be always present and to see us all the time, this wonderful being does not get a very firm hold on the child's life; he guides and controls him only slightly. Their conception of God has some of the characteristics of the "make-believe" of children at play. The significance of this fact should not be overlooked in considering the value to them of the beliefs they profess.

Must one regret the disappearance of systematic religious teaching? The answer to this question

¹A recent investigation of the religious beliefs of college students leads to a similar conclusion: "Christianity, as a system of belief, has utterly broken down, and nothing definite and adequate has taken its place. Their beliefs, when they have any, are superficial and amateurish in the extreme. There is no generally acknowledged authority; each one believes as he can, and few seem disturbed at being unable to hold the tenets of the churches. This sense of freedom is the glorious side of an otherwise dangerous situation." (The Belief in God and Immortality; a Psychological, Anthropological, and Statistical Study." Boston: Sherman, French & Co., 1916.)

depends entirely upon what kind of religious teaching one has in mind. Not every kind of religion is worth teaching. Although I cannot enter here into a detailed discussion of religious instruction, the matter is too much before the thoughtful public for me to pass it by altogether. The advice one hears is of three sorts.

1. There are those who say, Teach the truths of the Christian religion, which is the religion of the nation. Teach Bible history, the Catechism, the creeds. Teach these things early, that they may sink deep in the memory and heart of the child. Knowledge of them is good for him now; it will be better still later on when he understands more fully. This advice expresses what was until recently the general practice in Christian countries. It is still common in Germany. It has resulted in that country in religious instruction being looked upon, even by conservative theologians, as a cause of the ruin of religion. "There is an oft quoted epigram coined, I think, by the theologian Rothe, 'There must be much religion in the hearts of the German people inasmuch as religious instruction has not yet succeeded in rooting it all out.' A writer in the Christliche Welt speaks as follows: 'Our religious instruction is actually a source of danger to religion. It produces the most starting indifference toward everything religious.'" This failure is due essentially, I think, not to pedagogically defective teaching, but to lack of agreement between what is taught and the opinion of the intellectual and moral leaders. The contradictions between that which is taught in the traditional Sunday school and the beliefs or absence of belief expressed in the behavior and conversation of those about him, are too obvious and violent not to make an impression upon the child.

2. The second kind of advice may be acceptable to moderate liberals as well as to radicals. The child, it is said, cannot appropriate abstract conceptions; therefore the beliefs we wish him to hold should be put in simple anthropomorphic forms. He would in any case invest the divine Being with human shape and attributes. "A keen and sympathetic watch should be kept," writes Earl Barnes in one of his valuable papers on the religion of children, "for the appearance of the doubts that mark the transition. This is the crucial period; and ten to twelve is the most dangerous time. The older anthropomorphic ideas should now be exchanged for the spiritual equivalents held by the teacher and, in place of the earlier authority, an appeal should be made primarily to the feelings. In the first period theology is external; God is in his heaven and angels come and go between us. In the second period, the kingdom of heaven is within us." Even those persons who find themselves on uncertain theological foundations "should teach their children the fundamental ideas of the theology in the midst of which they live. Teach them as true? Yes, in the same way in which they would teach Mother Nature or the ordinary children's stories as true. At first the stories would simply be told and no questions of evidence would be raised. When the questions were raised, the parent would share with his child his own uncertainty."

This advice, in so far as it involves providing the child with ideas not shared by his parents, is usually based upon the recapitulation theory. This theory affirms that the child, in order to achieve his full growth, must pass through some or all of the steps by which man has reached his present development. "The best forms of faith always change, though the essence persists and increases." "A complete religious education on the recapitulatory theory would give to each child a touch of the best in every religion through which the race has passed from the lowest to the highest." (G. Stanley Hall). "A child who is jumped over some of the essential stages in his intellectual and spiritual growth will have lost something in the depth and strength of his humanity" (Barnes).

If the recapitulation theory purports to be but an affirmation of the impossibility in which the child is to be in his physical life at the highest point reached by his parents, it is not to be gainsaid. But if the theory is offered as a guide in determining what should be taught the child, it is to be rejected as useless. The tempered form of the doctrine, according to which the child is to retrace only some of the principal stages of the long, devious route over which the race has passed in its upward march (the only form of the doctrine deserving consideration), is in itself a denial of its pedagogical usefulness, since it involves the absolute necessity of omitting many of the stages, and gives no answer to the all-important question as to which stages should be omitted and which retraced. Shall we include among the steps to be retraced in religion the worship of nature-spirits and of ancestors? Shall the child be made to worship both human and animal gods? Through which one of the steps of the sacrificial rites shall he be led: the killing of animals; the offering of something else for the blood?

The recapitulation doctrine can be of no service whatever in determining which of the racial steps should be used and which should be passed over in the education of the child. Guidance in this matter will have to come from pedagogy and psychology. These will tell us what the child's mind is able to work with and what conceptions will best help him to the highest mental and normal activity. Would any one dream of finding in the practices of the race at different levels of its development safe guidance concerning the food most advantageous to man at different ages? The recapitulation theory is as useless for the determination of the succession of beliefs the child should entertain, as it is in the determination of the changes of diet he is to undergo.

3. In its thorough-going form, the third kind of advice is, Do not so much as pronounce the name of God until the child is able to form an idea of him that is in agreement with modern thought. "The child must not be taught things that he cannot understand, and therefore would misunderstand; for that would hamper him in his mental progress. Better have no ideas than false ideas." That is Rousseau's point of view. If by a false idea one means an idea that does not help one to pass on to other ideas, more serviceable because nearer the reality, this last sentence is pedagogically sound. Havelock Ellis' "Religion and the Child" expresses a similar opinion. "It cannot be too strongly emphasized that adolescence is the moment, and the earliest moment, when it becomes desirable to initiate the boy or girl into the mysteries of religion. That it is the best moment is indicated by the well recognized fact that the immediately postpubertal period of adolescence is the period during which, even spontaneously, the most marked religious phenomena tend to occur."

In behalf of the conception of God which is to be inculcated when the first or the second advice is followed, it might be urged first that that idea, crude as it is, provides an answer to many of the pressing childish inquiries. It accounts for certain striking things which happen to the child and to the people around him; it explains in general the universe and its workings. But are these explanations of any value? What is the advantage to our children of thinking, as the savage does, that a great, invisible man makes rain and the earthquake, causes sickness and health, poverty and riches—a God who as they say, can do everything? "He has power"; "What he says gets done."

The assumption of a personal cause back of the physical universe has no scientific value. It is true that it silences the child's questioning for awhile, perhaps for all time; but this is not a good, it is an evil. It would be better if the early questions of the child regarding nature were answered by a confession of ignorance on the part of the parent, or by the remark that the child will learn later on. This would at least not destroy a healthy curiosity in natural events. It would be better yet, when the child is no longer very young, to draw his attention to certain of the more obvious difficulties in the way of the crude explanation he may have "picked up." Thus mental activity would be encouraged and the way prepared for accepted scientific conceptions. From the point of view of the understanding of physical phenomena, the belief in such a God is not one of the steps through which a child needs pass; for it would not help him to ascend to modern scientific ideas about nature. This view of God is one of the steps through which it is economy for the child not to pass; for, instead of leading to the present day conception of the universe it blocks the way to it. It is a step leading to an impasse.

This idea of God might be thought to minister to the esthetic craving of the child and to his imagination. But a sense for beauty is much more naturally and effectively gratified and cultivated by beautiful objects present to the senses. And with regard to imagination, there is a wealth of other valuable material not open to an objection, on which it may feed.

It might also be maintained that this God has an ethical value for the child. If we propose by means of the idea of God to call forth the feelings often termed religious—awe, reverence, a sense of dependence, humility, confidence, love—and for these to provide means of expression, it seems clear that the conception of God held by the children of our investigation will but poorly serve the purpose. The value of these feelings is, of course, entirely dependent upon the qualities of the objects which call them forth. Reverence and love for things unworthy would be vice. Now, the paramount characteristic of the God of these children is his omnipotence. It is evidently in this attribute that most of them find the greatest relish.

Can we not do better for the moral and religious welfare of our children than trust to the influence of a miracle worker who, being omnipotent, does good and evil, or at least, permits evil? Could not everyone of the "religious" feelings be more adequately stimulated by the relations of the child to his parents, to society, and to nature? The social virtues of sympathy, love, helpfulness, thankfulness, he learns, as a matter of fact, in his intercourse with his parents and friends. The younger the child, the more completely true is the well known biblical passage, "Whoso loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Does the child develop an attitude of thankfulness through a belief that he owes everything to God, or through the realization that he is dependent upon his parents and upon society? The proper objects of the child's love and gratitude are, first, his parents and, second, the wider circle in which he moves. There, these virtues originate and are nurtured. To attempt at an early age to divert their expression to God, is not only an absurdity, but a moral error. "I remember a girl, an only child, whom I was treating for typhoid fever," writes Nathan Oppenheim. "Her mother had been telling her of God's great love; that even the sparrows, insignificant as they are, were included in it. The child retorted quietly, 'Don't you think that God spends too much time on sparrows? If he gave a little more attention to me, possibly I should not have to go for a whole month without a bit of real solid food.'" ("The Development of the Child," p. 136.)

It is a harmful perversion of a truth obvious to the child, to teach him that "God" gives him his food, his clothing, and his bed. And it is of advantage neither to his intelligence nor to his morals for him to be allowed to think, at any time of his life, that rain and sunshine, health and sickness, depend upon the will of an invisible, all-powerful being.

The preceding remarks bear upon the wisdom of accepting as a guide to education the "recapitulation" theory, of, for instance, inducing children to entertain the conception of God discussed above. With regard to that conception—one through which the race has passed—we may say with confidence, "Better for our children no idea of God, than such an idea."

There remains the question whether any other conception of God should be taught to children before they have reached, let us say, the age of fourteen. The traditional answer to this query is in the affirmative. But, in this instance as in many others, the traditional opinion has never been submitted to an adequately serious and systematic criticism.

Good and Evil, War and God.

That war, pestilence, flood and other calamities beget religious revivals, or turn the thoughts of hosts of stricken persons to immortality, reward in heaven, and God, has long been a familiar and intelligible fact, writes Victor Yarros in Reedy's Mirror (St. Louis). It is not a fact that has given Agnostics, or Positivists, or Freethinkers the least trouble, for it is quite easy to account for it.

But when a pseudo-scientific thinker and writer of "sociological fiction" like Wells "discovers God under the stimulus of war"—to use the expression of one surprised commentator—the phenomenon challenges some attention. Now, Mr. Wells has written several pieces, in several places, about the religious effects of the great war, but it is impossible to find a grain of serious thought in this stuff. What has happened to Mr. Wells? We know that he is highly impressionable and sensitive, open-minded and receptive, but surely he ought to be fallacy proof, especially if the fallacies are ancient, stale and transparent. Surely we are justified in expecting him to distinguish between ideas, conceptions, formulæ that mean something, and pseud-ideas, pseud-conceptions (to borrow Spencer's terms), and empty phrases that convey absolutely no meaning to any person capable of analysis.

Take this sentence from Mr. Wells' article in a recent issue of the Independent:

"Judaism, Christianity, Islam, modern Hindu religious thought, all agree in declaring that there is one God, master and leader of all mankind, in unending conflict, cruelty, disorder, folly and waste."

Yes, all religions of the advanced type postulate the idea of a God, a master, lord and leader of all mankind. This God is supposed to be perfect in every way—wise, benevolent, omnipotent. But no religion, and no theologian, has ever accounted for "evil" in the universe—that is, for what we humans think evil—war, pestilence, flood, earthquake, brutality, incurable disease, infant mortality, etc. Some say, foolishly, that the devil is responsible for evil; they do not stop to think of the implication of this notion. For what becomes of the power of their God? If the devil is not a super-god, then God is responsible for the devil and all his works.

Others, less foolishly, tell us that evil may be good for us, and that it is therefore not really evil at all. In other words, our moral and intellectual development is the result of struggle, endurance, discipline, suffering, and if we are to develop further, and reach perfection, God must continue to send us evil in liberal doses—an occasional sinking of a ship full of simple-minded men and women, with a number of babies thrown in; an occasional burning of an insane asylum or orphan home, an occasional flood, and the like.

At first blush there seems to be "something in" this theory, but reflection shows it to be naïve and crude and shallow. If evil is not evil, why do we punish so many forms and manifestations of it? Why do we punish "lower forms of competition" like murder, robbery, forgery, arson, fraud? Why do we condemn criminals and proclaim moral codes? Why do we resent injustice? Why do we deplore wars of aggression?

If the answer be that some evil is good for us and some bad, or needless, where is the line to be drawn? How do we know which evil is good and which bad? Perhaps we are often guilty of the blunder of resisting good evil and welcoming bad evil!

Finally, what reason or rhyme is there in the notion that God, the all-wise and all-powerful, had to adopt the singular course of making us humans perfect by means of horrors, cruelties and tragedies? What would we think of a man whose course toward his children and friends indicated a policy of "improving" them by physical and mental torture? Why could not God create the perfect man in the first place? And, if man is never to attain perfection, then where is the value of the discipline of evil? Why travel when there is no goal to reach?

Of course, the truth is, as Mr. Wells ought to know, that evil and good are human terms, and that "human, all-too-human," as Nietzsche said, are all our ideas, codes, institutions, social and religious arrangements. We have slowly emerged from savagery—haven't fully emerged yet, in fact. We are seeking to profit by the painful experience of the race, and are forbidding or tabooing the things which, on the whole, spell waste, misery and suffering. By "good" we mean the socially useful, the humanly desirable, and our ideas change and grow with economic and scientific progress.

We know, too, that the idea of God is an idea that has slowly been evolved out of ideas that we now regard as puerile—the ideas of tribal and local gods, of gods with human appetites and passions, of gods worse than some of us humans. The little local gods, we know, were all man-made and made, inevitably, in man's image. Is not the idea of a "God ruling the universe" merely a natural extension of the childish ideas of primitive men?

Suppose you clear away as much anthropocentric rubbish as possible and say that by God we mean the supreme intelligence that rules the universe. How far does this carry us? Can we form any real conception of that alleged supreme intelligence? Can we know anything of its purpose? Even orthodox religionists admit that we cannot know God or expect to understand his ways. If this be true, what aid do we derive from the idea of God? Would any sane person appeal to, or rely on, or seek comfort from, a judge whose ways, habits, purposes, opinions, emotions he could not hope to understand? A ruler and leader who is a Chinese puzzle to the wisest of the ruled is a singular conception indeed.

There are Agnostics who say that the war has given the coup de grace to Christianity and religion generally. They are mistaken. Even this terrible war will not destroy superstition and superstitious forms of religion. Millions will continue to believe without evidence, or against all the available evidence. On the other hand, to say that the war has made believers of Agnostics, has given the idea of God a stronger and firmer hold on educated and thoughtful persons, is to imagine a vain thing. It has had no such effect. The teachings of the Darwins, Spencers, Huxleys, Tyndalls, Comtes, Arnolds, Haeckels, have not been, could not be, disturbed by the war. The pretense that so futile and senseless a tragedy has revealed God to men of culture and native intellectual force who had previously denied his existence is utterly hollow. A few persons may have lost their balance and permitted their emotions to enslave their reason, but that is all.

Refining on Mohammed.

Dr. Samuel W. Zwemer, editor of the Moslem World, "has done more than any other man to remind Christendom that the Divine Message of the Gospel is for Mohammedans as much as for the rest of mankind." He shows that the best side of Islam is not the most popular, but that the Moslems are beginning to lay stress on the higher teachings of their prophet.

The reformer and mystic, al-Ghazali, has left a larger imprint upon the history of Islam than any man save Mohammed himself. Many of his doctrines are quoted in the Constructive Quarterly, which is devoted to "the faith, work and thought of Christendom," and it is interesting to see how tolerant an orthodox publication is of Mohammedanism. Superstition evidently loves company, and anyone who talks reverently of God may have a place in conspicuous print. No one is particularly shocked when the Reverend Ewers declares that he will not worship an American God, but only a God of all the world, and Mohammedans are not considered heathen like ourselves.

The Mohammedans are also blessed with a theological seminary in which al-Ghazali's book entitled (don't forget the name) "Al Maksud ul-Asna Sharh-asma-Allah ul 'Husna" is used as a textbook. It mentions the ninety-nine names or attributes of God in order and explains that the true believer must say always, "I know nothing but God, and, I know nothing of God." The last part is not so bad for a Turk, and his description of God's attributes "approaches very closely to the teaching of the New Testament."

Al-Ghazali says: "Every attribute or description you can possibly give to the human character God is too holy to possess." He tells a story of Jesus in these words: "It is related concerning Jesus (on Whom be peace) that one day he passed with His disciples on the wayside and saw a dead dog, already decaying. They said to Him, 'What a stench the beast is making!' 'Nay,' said Jesus (upon Him be peace), 'what is more beautiful than his pearly teeth?'" [Our printer made the mistake of giving a capital H to the word 'his' as applied to the dog also, but we decapitalized him.]

Often al (no capital permitted here) puts the words of Christ upon the lips of Mohammed. For instance, he says: "The Apostle of God (upon whom be prayers and peace), when his canine tooth was broken in the battle and blood streamed down upon his face, said, 'O God, direct my people, for they know not what they do.'" He says that we should not pray in the public streets, for there our mind is diverted, but that if we can pray towards a dead wall on which there is nothing to see, it will be helpful. He quotes with approval the practice of Sa'ad and Othman that the Koran should be read through once a week and that "he who does not sing the Koran is not of our religion." Mr. Zwemer suggests that "Christians might well follow al-Ghazali's excellent advice on reading the Koran in their perusal of the Scriptures." It makes no difference what you read (except, of course, THE TRUTH SEEKER'S books), provide you read it often enough and chant it in a truly religious tone. "Said the Messiah (upon Him be peace): 'Blessed is he to whom God has taught His book. He shall never die in his pride.' A man whose name the proof reader is obliged to omit gave this advice to the faithful: 'Whatever you do in your house, do it yourself as did the Apostle of God, for he used to milk the goats and patch his sandals and sew his cloak and eat with the servants and buy in the bazaar, nor did his pride forbid him carrying his own packages home.' Mohammed was a good boy, sometimes, as shown further by this: 'And, said the Prophet of God (upon him be peace) [you notice that they do not give Mohammed a pronominal capital], 'Whoever says that word I will forgive his sins even though he deserts the army!'"

The reporter fails to state what that word was, but we can guess. Al does not approve of all of the Prophet's ideas about women, but Mr. Sumner may read this paper, so we expunge. The editor of the Moslem World says: "The cross of Christ is the missing link in al-Ghazali's creed. He comes very close to Christianity and yet always misses the heart of its teaching." Poor al! The prophet predicted that "my people will be divided into more than seventy sects, of whom only one will be saved."

To hear some professing Christians talk one is led to believe that faith in God would reduce the cost of living; make beef and lamb cheaper; bring down the price of eggs and milk and put potatoes in every poor man's cellar free of expense. If there were more honesty in the world there would be fewer Christians and lots of churches would be for sale. If there were no fools on earth there would be no Christianity.

An honest man, in discussing the question of the hereafter, would say that he knew nothing respecting it, and leave it there. I do not see why it is necessary to make the earth a breeding place for heaven or hell. Why not teach men and women to seek the highest happiness here; to make the home more attractive, the community cleaner and better and life sweeter and fairer? The future has nothing for us until we get there.

"God in the world" seems to me to say: Get in my sunshine and I will warm you; get in my rain-storm and I will wet you; get in my river's current and I will carry you to the sea; get in my northeast gale and I may drown you; get in my hurricane and I will blow you to pieces; get in my drouth and I will burn you to death; get in my snow and I may bury you deep in a white graveyard. You may go with me, but not against me.

I always say: Don't go to a church to learn what Jesus said; go to the four gospels. You can read as well as a priest or minister. Read for yourself, and after you have read Matthew, Mark, Luke and John and found out how ignorant and superstitious Jesus was, and what foolish and absurd things he taught, you will probably conclude that you can be in better business than following him. I venture the assertion that not a church in the whole world tells the truth about Jesus.

How much do we know about God? How much more do we know about God than men knew two thousand years ago? How much more do we know about heaven or hell than men knew two thousand years ago? Let us have an honest answer. We know no more about these subjects than was known when Pagan Rome held the world in its grasp. We have had hundreds, thousands, millions, of books on these subjects, but no knowledge. We know nothing about God, nothing.

A certain preacher is very fond of telling his hearers to be guided by "divine wisdom," which means, when put in plain, honest language, by the words of the Bible. There are too many such idiots "ordained" to preach. Ordained to lie would be the true statement of the case. There is no divine wisdom, unless such wisdom may be found in the orderly course of nature. All the wisdom we have on this earth is human wisdom, and there does not seem to be enough of that to go round.

L. K. W.

We Stand by Spencer.

We have read a great deal of what Herbert Spencer wrote, and where we could follow his thought were compelled to agree that it was sound. Only his "Unknowable" gave us pause; for when a thing is unknowable that is all that can be said about it, yet Mr. Spencer, having affirmed his Unknowable, wrote concerning it at considerable length. Ultimately he made a dogma of it, thus expressed: "One truth must grow ever clearer—the truth that there is an Inscrutable Existence everywhere manifested, to which he [man] can neither find nor conceive either beginning or end. Amid the mysteries which become the more mysterious the more they are thought about, there will remain the one absolute certainty that he is ever in the presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed."

Long since we received from another philosopher, the late Stephen Pearl Andrews, a hint that the affirming of an unknowable was illogical, since to know it existed was to know the most important fact, everything else being mere detail. Then, contemplating Mr. Spencer's further statement that of the Unknowable nothing was known or could be known, we recognized that we were really getting knowledge of it. To this was added the information by Mr. Spencer that the Unknowable was infinite, so we have at least one of its attributes; and that it was absolute, which gives us another. Furthermore, there is a contradiction in calling a thing absolute, i. e., without relations, and then saying that from it all things proceed. Surely there is relation between a source and the things that proceed from it.

In a new book entitled "Herbert Spencer," by Hugh Elliot, being one of the series of "Makers of the Nineteenth Century" published by Henry Holt & Co., the author hints that in introducing the Unknowable into his philosophy Mr. Spencer was not wholly free from the suspicion of "playing to the gallery, or rather, let it be said, of allowing his thoughts to be swayed by the force of popular belief." However, we think better of Mr. Spencer than to believe that he deliberately advanced an idea, not defensible in his own mind, for the sake of making peace with theology. The Unknowable was a product of his old age.

In this most readable book of Mr. Elliot's we find noticed those parts of Spencer's science and philosophy, so eagerly accepted by the world a generation since, which are now left behind in the progress of human thought—unless we may say that they are left far ahead by the world's drifting backward. Little attention is paid by the author to Spencer's view of Christianity, in which he was a total unbeliever. It is a long way from Herbert Spencer to Billy Sunday, but the world has covered it. We can remember when the clergy seized upon Spencer's Unknowable as the horn of salvation. Now their hope is in the devil-god of the evangelist.

Herbert Spencer wrote and published his theories about evolution before Darwin and Wallace had announced the doctrine of natural selection, and for that reason was at the same disadvantage as were astronomers prior to Copernicus and Newton. He got the facts of evolution right, but gave the wrong reason for them, i. e., the inheritance of acquired characters or qualities. For example, he had small hands, and attributed the peculiarity to the fact that his ancestors for generations had done no manual labor. He would perhaps agree with the Lamarckians who hold that the giraffe has a long neck because its ancestors through a long past had been obliged to stretch after food that hung high; whereas the explanation by natural selection would be that the giraffe survived because its long neck enabled it to reach herbage that grew high where none grew at or near the ground. We understand that there has never been discovered, by observation or experiment, a single fact to show that acquired characters are transmitted; and yet the theory looks reasonable and is hard to abandon. It must be said, however, that no doubt is cast upon the theory of evolution because Mr. Spencer may have formed an erroneous conclusion as to the cause of evolutionary processes.

The Agnosticism of Mr. Spencer has not been affected by time. What he had to say about Christianity and supernatural religions remains true, and if men of science differ with him on other points they are approaching him more closely there.

Says Mr. Elliot: "Evolution and liberty are the two guiding stars of Spencer's philosophy. Evolution professes to be a statement of fact; it records the direction in which the material and spiritual changes of the universe are tending. Liberty, on the other hand, is put forward as a human aim and the highest injunction of political ethics." Mr. Spencer thought that evolution tended toward liberty. He was justified in this conclusion by the fact that evolution began with stuff that was pretty much all of one kind (homogeneous) and produced individuals. The world is immensely indebted to him for his conception of liberty—that everyone is at liberty to do as he pleases so long as does not interfere with the equal liberty of another. That idea appeals to the reason of fair-minded persons like Ingersoll's declaration that every man should be willing to give to all others every right that he claims for himself.

The realization of Spencer's philosophy of liberty was contingent on peace, on the abolition of war; and hence he was an antimilitarist. In this regard, nothing better could have happened to Europe than the adoption of Spencer's ideas instead of their opposite. "Europe," as his biographer says, "is now drenched in blood; its wealth and prosperity are fast being drained away." And the thought arises in his mind that "if Europe had followed Spencer, this war could never have occurred." If we may judge the quality of a doctrine by its consequences, that of Spencer was true and sound; and its opposite, which Europe chose to adopt, is disastrously false. The world, it is said, has reversed Spencer on the question of liberty. Viewing the result, is the world proud of its judgment?

Spencer's philosophy is uncompromising. Nothing in it can be twisted to justify invasion or militarism; and that is why Europe would not have it, but preferred Christianity, whose god is a man of war and whose prince of peace can be quoted as saying that he came to bring a sword. Europe is paying the penalty for making that selection.

A short summary of what Spencer accomplished appears on the jacket of the volume before us, as follows:

"We shall find that, without money, without special education, without health, Herbert Spencer produced eighteen large volumes of philosophy and science of many diverse kinds; that he invented an entire new system of philosophy which for half a century filled the attention of all thinking people; that he led the chief controversies on Evolution and Biology without ever having received any tuition in those subjects; that he wrote perhaps the most important text-book of Psychology of his century, without any acquaintance with the works of his predecessors, and scarcely any with those of his contemporaries; that he established the science of Sociology in England; that in all branches of so-called Moral Science he was recognized as a leader; that he became the philosophic exponent of nineteenth century Liberalism; that he published a variety of mechanical inventions; and that on endless other subjects, great and small, he set forth a profusion of new and original ideas."

Overpraise is not to be encouraged, but we believe that Spencer's accomplishments warranted the omission of considerable criticism which this book contains. We must not look for infallibility in philosophers; that belongs to exact science. Darwin once said that Spencer was a thinker, and not an observer, which is true. He also said that an inaccurate thinker is less dangerous than an inaccurate observer, because he can be corrected with less trouble and expense. Spencer's thinking may have been faulty in places, but so much of it is transparently true that in the main his philosophy ought to be regarded as established. What other philosophy will bear so well the test of inductive reasoning—the examination of facts and the comparison of them with his conclusions? After reading a hostile or unappreciative criticism of Spencer we follow the advice of Luther Burbank to the disciples of Darwin, which was to go and read him again. Our verdict on rereading a little of Spencer is that he was a philosopher of sound mind.

The Government Imposed Upon

As noted in recent articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the State Department at Washington and some members of Congress took it upon themselves to intervene with the government of Mexico in behalf of certain Catholic prelates who had been accused of conspiracy and placed under restraint, with the prospect of punishment awaiting them. These articles will be found in the numbers of this paper dated February 10 and February 17, 1917. It now looks as if Secretary of State Lansing and his cooperators in the affair had been themselves the victims of a conspiracy, hatched for the purpose of getting a precedent for such intervention with another government where Catholic priests were threatened. It was a false alarm and a hoax. The last number of the Catholic Citizen (Milwaukee) says:

"Recently it was alleged that two Mexican prelates were under arrest and threatened with death. But now we read:

"The latest information relative to the perilous position of Archbishop Jimenez of Guadalajara and Bishop Mora of Zacatecas, Mexico, which the State Department has received, was given out on January 31, and reveals the fact that Archbishop Jimenez was never arrested and that Bishop Mora was then on his way out of the country."

The State Department was taken in by the Catholic Bishop Cusack, who has been persistent in his attempts to make trouble between this country and Mexico over the church question. Secretary Lansing and the other Protestant statesmen who fell for the imposition may think they have at least made themselves solid with the church and will get their political reward. That, however, is a delusion. The church cherishes enmity toward those it cannot control, and never forgets an affront; but she never rewards her political tools. Roosevelt and Taft both truckled beyond precedent to Catholic power, but that power was not exercised in their behalf when, as candidates for the presidency, they needed it in the form of votes. The church uses the politician, and then forgets him for another who promises more. The Catholic paper quoted says of the Mexican matter:

"American Catholics are disposed to be strangely unruffled over the condition of the church in Mexico. For instance: how little that issue figured in the presidential election last November. The Catholic voter seemed to think that the alleged mistreatment of the Mexican Catholic clergy was a matter primarily for the faithful Catholics of Mexico themselves to restrain and redress. Besides which, there is a little suspicion at times of exaggeration in these pictures of persecution."

It was well enough known, through a statement made public by President Wilson's Catholic private secretary, Joseph Tumulty, that the reports of persecution of Catholics in Mexico were not only exaggerated but entirely without any foundation whatever. Not a single instance of it, said Mr. Tumulty, had come to the knowledge of the State Department, and now that one has been reported by Bishop Cusack, it turns out to be admittedly a fake.

Freethought Agitation in New York.

Alarm over New York's "Infidel missions" has seized the Missionary Review of the World, which is published here. According to that more or less accurate and veracious magazine, as quoted in the Literary Digest, a campaign for the destruction of Christianity is not only under way here, but its entrenchments are thrown out in a number of secularizing organizations. Christians, the world is told, have been "settling back with a sense of security in their Christianity, content to have pastors and a few other leaders take the entire responsibility of extending the gospel," while the Freethinkers have been banding themselves together and pledging each other support until the Missionary Review sees the Christian church confronted by "a strong, energetic and persistently busy organized force of Infidelity whose members are actively engaged in denying the deity and authority of Jesus Christ and attempting to overthrow the Christian church." The occasion of the agitation of the Review is a report by Mr. John N. Wolf, superintendent of the Beacon Light Gospel Hall, giving the following alleged facts:

"Several Infidel organizations in New York city are known by various titles that do not indicate their real character. Their favorite methods of attack are: first, aggressive outdoor meetings; holding meetings at Madison square and in all the principal thoroughfares at noon and at night whenever the weather permits. At these meetings Jesus Christ and the Bible are held up to ridicule, and many blasphemies are uttered.

"Distribution of Infidel literature is a second method of attack. Books and pamphlets written by Tom Paine, Robert G. Ingersoll, Voltaire, and others are widely distributed to the young men who make up most of the audiences, and who eagerly buy almost anything that is offered in that line. A monthly magazine is also published for the purpose of 'educating the public and freeing them from the bondage of religion.'

"A third form of this satanic activity is the debate, held sometimes at the public squares and sometimes in halls. The favorite themes at these meetings are: The Resurrection, The Virgin Birth, The Trinity, The Deity of Christ, and The Authenticity of the Bible. These debates are often carried on by educated and able men, who display considerable familiarity with the subjects. The enemy of God has able generals.

"Another method employed to spread Infidelity is the establishment of 'Sunday schools.' At least four of these in New York city have come to our attention recently. Boys and girls of the neighborhood are brought together and are taught that the Bible is not true and that Jesus Christ was either a mere man or is the mere creation of somebody's distorted imagination. Not long ago a seemingly prosperous man boasted that his two boys, ten and twelve years of age, could and did 'argue Christianity out of their schoolmates whenever the opportunity afforded.' What harvest must we expect from such seed-sowing?

"This aggressive Infidelity and Agnosticism are a challenge to the Christian church to proclaim the gospel by word and deed to the unchurched and unsaved multitudes of men, women and children in our cities. Many pastors and laymen are recognizing the opportunity offered by the street meeting to reach the masses, and year after year, during the spring, summer and fall months, they have gone out into the highways and byways preaching the word of life. If the average Christian layman were only half as energetic and enthusiastic in witnessing to his faith as the average 'Freethinker' is in voicing his unbelief, the activities of organized Infidelity in New York city would be met with such a wave of aggressive evangelism as has not been known since the apostolic days. Men and women, boys and girls, would then be brought from under the blighting, damning influence of Infidelity into the light and liberty of the Son of God."

If we were to write an account of the Freethought campaign in New York, it would be a less enthusiastic one than that of Mr. Wolf, who minimizes none of the facts. Regarding those Infidel organizations here "known by various titles that do not indicate their real character," we are not informed. The title of "Secular Society" surely conceals nothing. Meetings as announced on our last page are held by this society, and the young men who conduct them speak in the streets also and sell Freethought literature, including THE TRUTH SEEKER—which, by the way, is not a monthly magazine," but a weekly; while its purpose is inaccurately stated. We say its object is "to educate the people out of religious superstition"—slightly misquoted, it will be seen, by Mr. Wolf. Our methods may be crude, but do not include such impoliteness as calling Thomas Paine "Tom." The Sunday schools are presumably Socialist or those of the Ferrer Association, where religion is generally ignored.

Altogether, we are sorry to say, the movement is not so extensive as above represented. The fact is, all the Freethought work is carried on under duress. In the week ending February 17 four street speakers were arrested or summoned to court, and the following week opened with the arrest of a birth-control advocate who had ventured to bring the attitude of the Catholic church under criticism.

We must pay a tribute to Mr. Wolf for stating the facts as he sees them, and for saying how they are to be met, without prescribing arrest and imprisonment, or even the "closed fist" for the Freethought advocates. Here he shows a higher evolution than the Catholic antagonist of Freethought, who is for direct action and strong arm methods, supplemented by the police and courts.

The treatment the Freethought speakers are getting just now amounts to police persecution. A few days ago Mr. Irving Meirowitz was holding forth in Madison square, when a policeman summoned him to appear in court on the charge of selling without a license. He had a license but was not wearing the tag, holding that it was beneath the dignity of a public speaker to display that symbol of constraint under a free government. The court freed him, but that will not prevent his rearrest on some other fictitious charge.

It is noted that the speaker was merely summoned. The police do not like the comment or the temper of an audience when for no reason in law they grab a speaker and take him off his stand. They are getting polite enough to assure the audience that it is only a summons and that the speaker will not be bodily injured. Nevertheless it is asserted that they wreak themselves on his person when not under observation.

Some day this whole matter will have to be cleared up, and some sort of decision reached as to whether Freethinkers and other idealists are at liberty to exercise the same rights on the street that are enjoyed by all their opponents.

Meanwhile it will be seen that with the handicap imposed by the authorities the activities of the Infidels are not so extensive as the Missionary Review and Mr. Wolf would have their readers believe. The writers have exaggerated the facts, we suspect, with the purpose of inducing the faithful to loosen up and contribute more liberally to the missionary fund.

The Hearing on the Blasphemy Repeal Bill.

The bill to repeal the Connecticut blasphemy law of 1642 was introduced at the present session of the legislature of that state by Representative Parsons of Enfield at the request of Henry F. Fletcher of Hazardville. The hearing on the bill was had February 22, before the Judiciary Committee, at the end of a long calendar. The committee had been kept up the previous night until a late hour to consider bills relating to labor troubles and involving heated arguments, and in consequence were tired out and impatient to adjourn long before the blasphemy repeal bill was reached. Mr. Fletcher and Theodore Schroeder, Esq., Free Speech League counsel, appeared to favor the repeal, and no one to oppose it. In consideration of the manifest weariness of the committee, both speakers made their statements brief; and Mr. Lewis, attorney for Michael Mochus, whose arrest led to the motion to repeal, decided not to speak at all. The committee is expected to take the matter up in executive session, writes Mr. Schroeder, who is at present in Hartford.

One of our contemporaries displays high indignation because an occupant of the bench has suspended sentence on an offender upon condition that he should enlist in the army or navy. The guilty judge is Supreme Court Justice W. O. Howard, who was holding court in Columbia county, this state, when the unfortunate incident occurred. The condition imposed by the court may be an unusual and even a cruel form of punishment, and not prescribed by law; but in making it Justice Howard displayed more good sense than dozens of judges and magistrates throughout the country have done in passing similar extraordinary sentences. We read frequently of sentences suspended upon condition that the offender shall join a Sunday school, or attend church regularly for six months. We recall one case where a prisoner was sent to jail until he should have learned a given number of verses of the Bible so that he could repeat them; and outside this paper there has been no rebuke of the violations or disregard of the law in such cases made and provided. Judge Howard, in proposing that the man should join the army and navy, was at least not ignoring the principle of separation of religion and the state, as occurred flagrantly in the other instances cited.

Herbert Spencer was an extreme individualist, and Prof. Jacques Loeb, the Rockefeller Institute biologist, leans to the side of collectivism. And yet both of them find war and militarism opposed to their principles and disapproved by science. War, as Paine pointed out, is the business of monarchies. Established churches and hierarchies have also supported military measures. Established churches and hierarchies have also supported military measures. Herbert Spencer and Professor Loeb agree as to the utter uselessness of war because both are unbelievers in supernaturalism and have in view the good of humanity alone.

END OF A CATHOLIC MYTH.

The One, Namely, That a Romanist Ever Set Up Toleration in This Country.

It is asserted by Catholics, by them universally believed, accepted by some Protestants and even some Freethinkers, that the early Roman Catholic colonists of Maryland were the first to grant religious liberty in America. Even Ingersoll, accurate as he was, gives them credit for this. When Mr. Gladstone had his controversy with Cardinal Manning, that ecclesiastic made the same claim and Mr. Gladstone set him right. Bancroft accepts the myth in the first edition of his "History of the United States," but repudiates it in later editions. A lie, once imbedded in history, like the proverbial bad reputation of the canine, and goes marching on, however often it is proved to be a lie, especially if some one is interested in propagating it. Our purpose is to show that this fiction has been thoroughly exposed.

In the city of Baltimore you see on all sides the name of Calvert. When you inquire who this Calvert was, after whom a street, a building, a square and many other things are named, and whose statue and bust are to be seen, you are told that he was George Calvert, the first Lord Baltimore and founder of religious freedom on the American continent. Turning to history, we find that he was born a Protestant in the year 1580. He became the friend of King James the First, who sent him to Ireland to investigate grievances. For this he was rewarded by being made a knight in 1617, secretary of state in 1619, and a pensioner of £2,000 per year in 1620. He was in the House of Commons in 1621 and 1624. Here he had trouble. An effort was being made to form a Spanish alliance and arrange a marriage between the Catholic Spanish princess and the Prince of Wales. Calvert favored it, but it was foiled. He then announced himself a Roman Catholic, and offered his resignation to the king, who refused it. James further rewarded him by making him Lord Baltimore of Baltimore, county of Langford, Ireland, where he was given large grants of land. Lord Baltimore determined to enter into colonization schemes. He obtained a charter to establish a colony in Newfoundland, which he did in 1621, naming it Avalon. Visiting the colony himself in 1627, and finding the climate uncongenial, he set sail for Virginia, where he was not permitted to land unless he took the oath of allegiance and supremacy. Being a Catholic, the latter he could not take. He then sailed for England to obtain another charter, but died, April 15, 1632, without receiving it. Why this man, who had never seen Maryland—indeed had never heard of it—should be so lauded for anything good or condemned for anything bad about that state is one of the mysteries of godliness.

In England at that day were the Catholic party, the Church of England party and the Puritan party. All these in their objects were political and all were striving to obtain control of the government. This fact should be kept in mind.

George Calvert had a son, Cecil Calvert, who on his father's death succeeded to his title and estates. On the 20th of June following his father's death, a charter was issued him to settle the territory now called Maryland. Strange to say, this charter contained not a word about religious liberty. (See Cobb's "Rise of Religious Liberty in America," p. 367.) It did stipulate that no laws detrimental to the Christian religion should be passed. It was verbally understood, however, that toleration should be extended to all Christians.

What was the second Lord Baltimore's religion? It was somewhat hazy. Harper's "Encyclopedia of United States History" says: "In religion and politics he was very flexible, being quite indifferent to either, and he did very little for the religious and intellectual cultivation of the colonists." The same authority says that after the death of King Charles in 1649 he openly professed himself a Protestant, and appointed a Protestant, William Stone, governor of the colony. On the 22d of November, 1633, the first expedition sailed. It consisted, as Cecil Calvert wrote to his friend Wentworth, afterwards the ill-fated Earl of Stratford, "of twenty gentlemen of very good fashion and two hundred laboring men." What was their religion? The above-named authority says: "The Calverts and the 'other gentlemen' and part of the laboring men might have been Catholics, but the greater portion of the latter were Protestants." Cobb is even more specific. He says: "The first expedition was composed of two hundred and twenty emigrants. Of this number one hundred and twenty-eight were Protestants" (p. 368). Two Jesuit priests accompanied the expedition; yet in the assembly of 1639, the Catholics made their religion the state religion. Strange to say, Catholics did not take kindly to Lord Baltimore's benevolent colonial scheme for their benefit. Cobb says:

"The majority of Protestants over Romanists, noted in the first company of colonists, steadily increased. The Jesuit White wrote as early as 1641: 'Three parts of the people in four at least are heretics.' It is estimated that by 1649 there had come no less than a thousand from Virginia. . . . The population of the colony thus became overwhelmingly Protestant. For some reason Baltimore's asylum for his co-religionists did not attract many of them, a fact that may well seem strange. . . . Perhaps we can find no better explanation of this fact than the supposition that the average Romanist conscience refused to purchase peace by tolerating other faiths." (Ibid, p. 374.)

Here was the condition of affairs: The colony "overwhelmingly Protestant," with the Puritans and the Dutch on the north and the Cavaliers on the south, all eager to make reprisals upon Romanists for their cruelties in Europe. Even if the Romanists had been in the majority, could they afford to do anything else but "be good"? At least, where is their justification for boasting about a religious liberty law, or any other law, when they were in a hopeless minority, and the Protestants a few years afterwards set the machinery of persecution against them?

Let us now look at this wonderful "toleration act," whether it was passed by Catholic or Protestants. To begin with, it punished blasphemy and denial of the trinity by death. It imposed a fine of £5 for speaking "reproachful words of the Virgin Mary, the apostles, or evangelists." It meant toleration only for trinitarian Christians, the Unitarian, the Jew and the Infidel not being permitted to enter the colony.

In 1631 a young man arrived in New England from London. He was, as is generally understood, of Welsh parentage. His age, as nearly as can be ascertained, was about twenty-six years. He was a minister, originally intended for the Church of England. He had been a friend of Lord Coke. Not liking the forms of the Anglican church, he withdrew from it and joined the Nonconformists. He was a man of great heart, with an intense love of liberty. Upon arriving in New England he began to preach. From the first he denied the right of the government to legislate upon the subject of religion, or in any way to interfere with the consciences of men. For this, he lost pulpit after pulpit, and was often haled before the court.

"No sooner had he set foot upon the shores of New England than he came in conflict with the ecclesiastical and civil authorities of the colony, whom he found arrayed against him, for asserting and maintaining with unwavering fidelity those principles which have immortalized his name as the champion of religious liberty" (Encyclopedia Americana). This young man was ROGER WILLIAMS, THE REAL FOUNDER OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN AMERICA AND IN THE WORLD. He not only established religious liberty in America, but for so doing he suffered. A decree of banishment was issued against him. They thought of kidnapping him, putting him upon a ship and sending him back to England. To avoid this he was obliged to fly into the wilderness in the dead of winter and take refuge among the savages. After six weeks' wandering, at the mercy of the wild beasts and wild men, he arrived at a place which he called Providence. There he determined to establish a colony where religious persecution should not enter. He did so. The witch-hangers and Quaker torturers of Massachusetts sought to drive him even from there. They made complaint to the government in England. Finally, they were shamed by Williams' saving their lives. They were about to enter into a war with the Indians, who had joined tribes to exterminate the whites. The most powerful tribe in New England was the Narragansetts. Roger Williams treated the Indians with justice and won their friendship, while his Puritan neighbors on the north sold them as slaves. His influence with the Narragansetts was so great that he prevented them from joining the Indian confederation and the lives of his old enemies were saved.

The Quaker, the Unitarian, the Jew, the Infidel came here, knowing that their religious liberties were secure. In 1644, Mr. Williams went to England to obtain a charter for the new colony. He obtained it, but so bitter was the disposition of his enemies that it was refused admission into the New England Confederacy, and everything possible was said and done to bring him and his colony into disrepute.

In 1647, the first legislature met. After mentioning a number of acts that are forbidden, one law reads: "ALL MEN may walk as their consciences persuade them, everyone in the name of his God." THIS WAS TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MONSTROSITY CALLED A TOLERATION ACT WAS PASSED IN MARYLAND, and it was faithfully carried out.

The Encyclopedia Britannica (eleventh edition) says: "He [Williams] was the first and foremost exponent in America of the theory of the absolute freedom of the individual in matters of religion; and Rhode Island, of which he was preeminently the founder, was the first colony consistently to apply this principle to practice."

"Rhode Island, probably the first commonwealth in history into whose fundamental constitution was incorporated an unequivocal guarantee of religious liberty" (Encyclopedia Americana).

"Within five years from the settlement of Massachusetts this young preacher—the learned, quick-witted, pugnacious Welshman, Roger Williams, had announced the true principles of religious liberty, with a clearness of insight quite remarkable in that age" (Prof. John Fiske).

"Himself [Williams] the first among philosophers and statesmen, since the days of Constantine, to proclaim the complete freedom of mind and conscience from all civil bonds, he became the founder of the first state in whose fundamental law that freedom was incorporated, not only as a charter of liberty, but as the actual reason and purpose of the state's existence" (Cobb, p. 423).

We claim to have established the following facts:

I. The Lord Baltimore of whom Catholics boast so much not only never set a foot upon the soil of Maryland, but died before he ever heard the name.

II. His son, the second Lord Baltimore, obtained the charter after his death.

III. That this second Lord Baltimore was a man of no practical religious principles, but if anything was a Protestant.

IV. That the majority of the first emigrants to Maryland were Protestants, and that at no time were Protestants not in the majority.

V. That the Maryland law of 1649 pertained only to Trinitarian Christians, and imposed the severest penalties upon the Unitarian, Jew and Unbeliever.

VI. That Roger Williams proclaimed religious liberty in Massachusetts in 1631, two years before the first Maryland expedition started and one year before Lord Baltimore obtained his charter to make a settlement.

VII. That in 1647 the first legislature of Rhode Island passed, not a toleration act, but a law which held that religious liberty was a natural right to all, Christian, Jew, Unitarian, Infidel and Pagan.

VIII. In short, we think we have shown that the Romanist plea of establishing religious liberty in America has no basis in fact. It is accepted only by the unreading and unthinking, the gullible and the bigoted.

Another Catholic boast is that Charles Carroll, a Catholic, signed the Declaration of Independence, and that the Catholics of Maryland were loyal to the patriotic cause. Truly wonderful! But let their own standard authority, the "Catholic Encyclopedia," give the facts: "At the close of the Revolution, the whole population [of Maryland] was 200,000; Catholics, 15,000, divided into 9,000 adults, 3,000 children and 3,000 slaves." When we remember that Maryland was one of the most patriotic states during that contest, and that her soldiers were second to none in giving an account of themselves on the field of battle, was it not in the interest of the 15,000 Catholics, among a population of 200,000, the great majority of whom favored the American cause, to sustain that cause also? How could their representative in Congress do anything but sign the Declaration of Independence? They had an example in the Episcopal clergy, most of whom were tories, and had to flee, and as a result their church in the United States, though all-powerful before the Revolution, for years afterward was in a disorganized condition.

We will cheerfully admit that individual Catholics have been good citizens, and have been patriotic. But neither civil nor religious liberty ever existed in a place where their church was strong enough to stifle it, and their talk as to what their church has done for either in the United States is foolish and puerile. FRANKLIN STEINER.

"A great many people need reconversion at 45, however Christian they have been before." "Jesus is remarkable for his omission to devise machinery or organization for the accomplishment of his ends," says T. R. Glover, St. John's College, Cambridge. He made the road to perdition broad enough.

A VIEW OF RATIONALISM.

Hugh M. Martin, Esq., Makes a Judicious Statement of Its Fundamental Principles.

When in the early part of this month the Rationalists of Clarksburg, W. Va., and its vicinity met to organize themselves into a Rationalist society, Mr. Hugh M. Martin, of Shinston, attorney and counsellor at law, was chosen to make a public statement of the society's principles and objects. Following is the major portion of his address at the first meeting. The address was entitled "Rationalism and Why: Its Mission, Purposes and Advantages."

Rationalism has been defined as a system of opinions deduced from reason, as opposed to those based upon inspiration or revelation.

It might be more succinctly defined as pure reason. There is nothing spectacular about it, nothing alluring; it vaunteth not itself and is not puffed up. It is cold, calculating, unemotional human reason, without tinsel power or regal trappings to attract the profane vulgar or to awe their imaginations.

The Rationalist accepts nothing as facts not proven to be such, and holds that every fact or truth which we are justified in accepting as such is capable of demonstration. It is without dogmas and articles of faith.

The Rationalist accepts nothing upon the mere ipse dixit of any man, no matter how eminent, proficient or veracious he may be, except it be matters of occurrence which in the nature of things, human experience teaches us might have happened and of which he may have been a personal witness. We would accept a reputable man's testimony of the commitment of a burglary of which he may have been a witness.

We accept the statements of astronomers as to the size and distances of the planets and fixed stars, for the reason that they are ever ready and willing to exhibit their proofs and to demonstrate to our satisfaction the methods they employ to determine these facts; and we can confirm them for ourselves if we will take the pains.

No one in the scientific world arrogates to himself the possession of the keys to the kingdom of knowledge.

What is known is an open book and accessible to all; there are no secret orders or mysticism in the scientific world, and there is no reason why any truth or fact known to any one person may not be known by all. The doors of the vast treasury of human knowledge forever stand ajar, and knowledge is not consumed by use or depleted by acquirement.

Human nature is such that those in possession of a truth seek to impart it to the world.

When Archimedes discovered how to find the amount of alloy in Hiero's crown, he exclaimed "Eureka" (I have found it), and celebrated the event. So every discoverer of a truth has been its herald to the world.

To accept as facts or truths any proposition, whether in science, politics or religion, upon assumption or articles of faith, is an abuse and stultification of the reasoning faculties that tends to intellectual and logical chaos.

Horrible and repulsive as the practice may be, if the Creator has spoken, it is just as logical to believe in and offer human sacrifice as an article of faith and a supposed compliance with a divine requirement as it is to be baptized or partake of the eucharist, since they are both based upon an assumption or supposition.

So the question whether you should be baptized and whether you should offer human sacrifices depends on whether they are divine requirements. And how are we to determine whether they are or not? Only by the acid test or enlightened emancipated human reason—by Rationalism.

If you should ask a Hottentot why he believes the offering of human sacrifices is a divine requirement, he will tell you because his grandfather told him so. It is an article of faith with him.

So if you should ask a Christian why he believes that partaking of the eucharist or being baptized is a divine requirement, he will tell you because some apostle or supposed apostle told him so. It is an article of faith with him.

And should you ask the one where his grandfather and the other where the apostle, as the case may be, procured his knowledge, they will both tell you it must have been so, otherwise it would never have gotten currency in the first place; so you will see one is just as logical as the other as an article of faith.

The Rationalist says to the creedist: Adduce the proofs of your assertions, and if they are such as circumspect reasonable men consider sufficient to create belief, in matters of facts, in history and in other fields of inquiry, we will believe them; otherwise we will reject them. Is that not fair and reasonable?

Having outlined a few of the principles employed by clear thinkers for the discovery of truth and the exposing of error, and having made a few applications of them, we repeat by way of emphasis that Rationalism seeks to habituate men to the use and employment of true principles in the formulation of their opinions on all subjects and thereby make clear, precise and accurate reasoners of the children of men; to broaden the horizon of their mental vision and to place them on a higher intellectual pedestal.

Rationalism is intellectual rather than normal.

It believes that education is the only lever capable of elevating the world; that by a development of the intellectual the moral will take care of itself; that, as the great Ingersoll has said, "intelligent self-love embraces in its mighty arms all the human race; that every crime is a mistake and that only the man that does wrong carries a cross, and that to the man that does right the cross changes to wings on his shoulders and bears him upward forever."

It indulges in no idle dreams and hugs no delusions of a superabounding optimism; it is eminently practical.

It makes no claims to be able to abolish wars or to banish poverty or to transform human nature; but it can and does expose the Christian fallacy that Christianity is capable of doing these things and effecting a Utopian condition of social affairs when, in the extravagant language of the scriptures, righteousness will cover the earth as waters the great deep.

Nor is it to be expected that Rationalism will produce a uniformity of opinions on all subjects; there will ever be controversial fields.

Many subjects are relative rather than positive and different men will have different ideals.

Some will prefer a strong centralized form of government, like Germany, where the agencies of government are more fixed and stable and less elastic to popular shocks, and where great governmental schemes and enterprises can be entered upon and carried out without liability to frustration by fluctuations of policy made necessary because of change of sentiment in the fickle, unwieldy masses; while others will prefer a free popular government, responsive to popular demands, believing its advantages will more than counterbalance its disadvantages.

Some will be militaristic, believing in a firm assertion and vindication of national rights, while others will be pacifists, favoring a policy of forbearance to avoid the evils of the measures that must be employed for their maintenance.

No powers of mind is capable of fixing the exact point at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue and becomes a contemptible pusillanimity.

On these and a great many other controversial subjects we shall ever find a diversity of opinions among the wisest and best.

But some errors are inexcusable, since the application of ascertained facts by disciplined minds and unerring logic will prove them fallacious. Upon these we may expect a practical uniformity of opinions on the part of well-informed Rationalists.

The man well-grounded in Rationalistic principles is immune to a great many of the stupidities that have distracted the world.

Men of prodigious intellectual endowments have squandered energies and abilities that might have been profitably employed in other directions in futile controversies over stupid, inane subjects unworthy of consideration.

Calvin wrote a book on whether the eucharist should be taken sitting or kneeling.

Nor should we be unmindful of the fact that even on controversial subjects men of wide information, clear mental vision and vigorous understandings, like Ingersoll, Spencer, Jefferson and Franklin, are entitled to a peculiar respect; we should choose the best for our guides.

Rationalism is not a revolutionary movement seeking to overturn the established order. It seeks to prove all things and to hold fast to that which is good. What is sound, logical and practical it seeks to conserve and confirm, and what is illogical and unphilosophical it seeks to expose and destroy.

It combats religion so far only as religious tenets, when tested by the Rationalistic standards, are found unsound and fallacious. It is constructive rather than destructive. It seeks to establish the true boundary line between the known and the unknown and to extend the limits of the known.

If we can teach men to reason correctly, think accurately, subdue bias and prejudice, and make the attainment of truth the ruling passion, everything else will be added unto us and the mission of Rationalism will have been fulfilled.

Rationalism appeals to thinking, philosophic men, to lovers of truth. It is not a servile conformity to prevailing opinions; and the better informed, the clearer reasoner and the stronger one's understanding, the better Rationalist he is. We are not troubled with the apostasy of our wisest and best, whereas in the religious world it is a matter of common knowledge that the quantity of faith is just in inverse ratio to that of knowledge; and the more extensive their knowledge, the more vigorous their understanding and commanding their abilities, the less stable is their orthodoxy and the more prone they are to heresy.

Let us bear in mind that only by keeping Rationalism pure and undefiled, and by a scrupulous adherence to the great principles which constitute its foundation stones, can we expect it to retain that high degree of excellency that has won it the support and applause of the great thinkers of the past, of whom we are justly proud, and that must secure us worthy recruits for the future and perpetuate its usefulness for coming generations.

It was this philosophy, its consistency and harmony with the eternal nature of things, that gave to Rationalism Ingersoll, Huxley and Spencer, and it is only through the retention of these qualities in their integrity that we can hope to attract worthy successors to these noble names.

Isms, Mortal and Immortal.

There are isms and isms and isms to burn,
They meet you and mock you at every turn;
Each has its disciples, apostles and saints,
But the ism-blighted microbe's the soul of all taints.

So mankind divides into world-warring sects,
Each hating all others, all armed with their "texts," Dogmatism—that inhuman beast in them all—
This blunts them and blinds them and binds them in thrall.

But there's coming an ism, though yet hardly e'en born,
Shall displace all these freaks, mummies, makeshifts out-worn,
In the heart of mankind implanted, conceived,
Humanism its name, human freedom its creed.

Then shall hate be transmuted to love pure and true,
Which with kindness toward all each soul shall imbue;
Then war and all baseness forever shall cease,
And all humankind live in honor and peace.

Then none shall be honored for what they "believe,"
Nor unhonored because they decline to receive
The conclusions of others, which to them don't appear
To be really quite settled and perfectly clear.

There can be no dishonor to him who is true
To himself and his conscience, whate'er may ensue;
And remember, O man, from the days of thy youth,
All honor is empty not grounded in truth.

[Apropos of the foregoing musings on the subject of "Isms," the following epitaph is respectfully suggested as a not altogether inappropriate sentiment to be in due time inscribed upon the tombstone of the "deceased" (but unlamented), and upon that of each one of the multifarious and pestiferous brood to which he belongs and which time and unerring destiny shall, sooner or later, consign to their eternal rest and ultimate oblivion in the Ism family cemetery.]

DOGMA T. ISM.

Born..... Died.....
Here lies the dead form of our once cherished Ism,
A prey to the microbe that's called dogmatism;
It was sometime ago his soul took its flight,
Cause of death: ismitis or ism-blight.

He puffed himself up and threw out his chest,
And declared, "Of all isms, I'm surely the best;
Of scores upon scores, I only, am right!"—
A ne'er failing symptom of ism-blight.

The doctors were called, but, alas! 'twas too late;
The patient was doomed to his natural fate,
Every known treatment was tried—all in vain—
Poor Ism will ne'er throw his chest out again!

The end came so stealthily no one could tell
Just when dissolution had sounded its knell—
When death had, for sure, absolutely occurred;
But, alas! the end came, and at last he's interred.

Take warning, kind friends, from this typical case,
Lest your ism, too, finds its last resting place
In this graveyard of derelicts yawning for all
Isms, black, white or yellow, old or young, large or small.

We doubt if there are many Christians who live a purer life than Colonel Ingersoll, or whose principles involve more of justice and humanity. Joseph McCabe in Pittsburgh.

Under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Rationalist Society, at North Side Carnegie Music Hall, Mr. Joseph McCabe of London lectured on "Tolstoy and Nietzsche," Friday evening, Feb. 16, 1917.

On the Sunday preceding, Marshall J. Gauvin, lecturer of the society, delivered an informing address, ostensibly on Mr. McCabe's late book, "The Tyranny of Shams," but really a review of his life and work. However, the title was most appropriate, since Mr. McCabe's entire career has been and is a revolt against tyranny and oppression and a striving towards the betterment of the condition of his fellowmen—an expression of the spirit of humanism.

This address sharpened the already keen anticipation of the Rationalists of Pittsburgh and vicinity, and a large, appreciative and sympathetic audience gathered to hear Mr. McCabe. Mr. Gauvin introduced the speaker in a ringing little speech, at the close of which he presented him as the "world's foremost living Rationalist."

Mr. McCabe's lecture more than fulfilled the great expectations of his hearers. He spoke without restraint along Rationalistic lines, showing, from that point of view, wherein Tolstoy was wrong in turning to the Sermon on the Mount for a solution of modern social problems, and how Nietzsche erred in believing that only pitiless struggle and conflict would evolve the superman. The ethics of the Sermon on the Mount, said he, in effect, were well enough for men who believed that the near-at-hand end of the world would soon destroy the existing social order, since this belief aroused an intense zeal and desire for individual salvation in the coming judgment, and left no room for social idealism. On the other hand, Nietzsche, misunderstanding Darwin, stopped short before observing that although might seemed to be right in the evolution of the past, it is not so in the world of modern man, and that society is able to make infinitely greater progress by intelligent cooperation and social enthusiasm. Science, said Mr. McCabe, discloses apparently no purpose in human life; this leaves the management of human affairs free from the interference of any god; our earth belongs to us; we may make of it what we will; and we should make this our purpose—to do away with ignorance, poverty, misery and unhappiness—in a word, to hasten the inauguration of the era of humanism.

Of course, one can give but a bald, undetailed outline of Mr. McCabe's inspiring words. The prolonged applause attested the enthusiasm of his listeners, who seemed very loath to leave the hall.

This occasion most certainly was, as Mr. Gauvin phrased it, a "red letter day" for the Pittsburgh Rationalist Society, and will not soon be forgotten.

During Mr. McCabe's all too short stay in Pittsburgh, he was entertained by Mr. and Mrs. George Seibel, who, we may have no doubt, left nothing undone looking towards the comfort and convenience of their distinguished guest.

Mundelein vs. "A. W. P."

In his complaint against the State of Illinois, which has now withheld funds hitherto paid to Catholic orphanages, Archbishop Mundelein has dealt religion a terrific blow. Seemingly regarding himself as the acme of wisdom, he takes up arms against an all-wise providence. He says:

"The result of this decision [of Judge Baldwin] would be to throw more than 2,000 dependent orphans into the street, unless our institutions take them without any compensation. These children were committed to our care under the existing law; . . . institutions were built by us for the sole purpose of saving the immortal souls of these waifs of a big city, whom an all wise providence [hereinafter 'A. W. P.'] has left fatherless and motherless, hungry, homeless, abandoned, . . . who today have no one to plead for them, for their soul's salvation, but the bishop."—Chicago Herald, Feb. 12.

Can any theologian prove the all wisdom of using all power to produce orphans, then withdrawing state help ("all power is from God"—Leo XIII), imperiling both body and immortal soul?

Archbishop Mundelein mentions the "congested city, festering with many sores that need a nursing hand." Said city is the work of A. W. P.

Under the cruel despotism of A. W. P. "their faith, the one thing their parents left them, the one thing their baby fingers are not strong enough to hold—except—except—the good Catholic people have pity on them."

Faith in the A. W. P. that burns them and then withdraws all nourishment, surely ought to be kept in the very young—surely no reasoning adult can hold faith after seeing the picture drawn by Mundelein!

"For others of you, the day may come, though

I hope it never will, when your children may be left destitute. Surely you would not want their souls placed in jeopardy, never to see them in paradise, because their faith had been torn out of their hearts"—by an all-wise providence.

Which means that Mundelein hopes that A. W. P. will do better by the orphans than it has done.

A GUARDIAN.

The Bible in Our Schools.

1. In eleven states and in the District of Columbia the law is favorable to the use of the Bible. These are Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Jersey, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Dakota. In Mississippi the provision is found in the state constitution. The law of North Dakota declares that "the Bible shall not be deemed a sectarian book. It shall not be excluded from any public school."

2. In eleven other states either the courts or the state school superintendents have decided that the use of the Bible in the school room is lawful. In Maine, Michigan, Kentucky, Ohio, Texas and West Virginia favorable decisions have been rendered by the supreme courts. In Arkansas, Idaho, Rhode Island, Utah and Vermont the state school superintendents have so decided.

3. There are thirteen states where there are neither laws nor opinions bearing directly upon the matter. These are, Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and Wyoming.

4. In eight states there are opinions rendered against its use either by the supreme court, the attorney-general or the state school superintendent. Illinois and Wisconsin are the only two states in which the supreme court has so decided. There is a decision by the supreme court of Nebraska against the sectarian use of the Bible which has been regarded by some as adverse to any use of it, but this is not a fair interpretation. The attorneys-general have declared its use illegal in California, Missouri, Minnesota and Washington. The school superintendents have given similar opinions in Arizona, Montana and New York. In the last named state opinions are conflicting, each superintendent deciding according to his own wish in the matter.

5. In two states it would be difficult to find a school in which the Bible is read, although there are no decisions against it. These are Nevada and New Mexico. It is quite generally read in the Protestant sections of Louisiana, while in the Roman Catholic sections it is excluded.

As to the extent to which the Bible is used, it is not easy to get complete information. In most of the schools embraced in the first and second classes as given above, the information at hand indicates that it is used. As to the third class no uniformity prevails. In some states the Bible will be found in the majority of the schools, while in others it may be found in but few. In the fourth class, notwithstanding the adverse opinions, there are many schools in which it is used. Even the opinion of the supreme court of Wisconsin allows the reading of portions that the judges consider unsectarian.—The Christian Statesman.

Queer Newspaper Accuracy.

In the New York Journal of February 17 occurs the following strange item:

"ONE-TIME SWEETHEART OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN DIES.

"Winchester, Ill., Feb. 17.—Mrs. Linnie Cheatham, seventy-six years old, one-time sweetheart of Abraham Lincoln, is dead at her home here.

"Mrs. Cheatham was the daughter of Major R. E. Haggard, Mexican and Civil War veteran. At one time he kept a tavern, much frequented by lawyers, politicians and court officials, and Miss Haggard often entertained the guests with singing. It was there Lincoln met her and wrote and dedicated a poem to her."

If the good lady was seventy-six years old, she must have been born in the year 1841. About that time Abraham Lincoln got married. She was of a later generation than Lincoln, who perhaps knew her; but the "One-time Sweetheart" story might be accepted without question a hundred years from now.

THOMAS PAINE.

NOTES AT LARGE.

If one holds to a religion indefensible in reason, history and fact, he may summon a policeman to its defense if the religion be Roman Catholicism and the officer an adherent of that faith. Here is an example we take from the New York Sun of February 21:

"Stephen Kerr was haranguing a crowd in Madison Square Park yesterday on birth control when a young woman passed, listened and stopped. When she had caught the full drift of Kerr's remarks, which included an attack on the Roman Catholic church for its opposition to birth control, she could restrain her indignation no longer.

"She demanded if there was no good American citizen present to stop Kerr. She was the daughter of a civil war veteran, she said, and Kerr ought not to be allowed to talk like that.

"Here is a poor deluded woman," shouted Kerr in scornful tones, pointing a finger of derision at the woman, and the crowd jeered. The woman, who said she was Miss L. M. Kenny of 194 Rodney street, Brooklyn, promptly called a policeman and Kerr was arrested.

"Kerr, before Magistrate Cobb in Yorkville Court, admitted that Miss Kenny's version of what had occurred was correct. He offered to apologize, but Miss Kenny said he would have to apologize to the millions of Roman Catholic men and women in America and to the Stars and Stripes which he had insulted. A $5 fine was then imposed, but Kerr said he would go to jail rather than pay the fine. Which was immediately ordered."

The appeal to the American flag by a hysterical female for the protection of the Sacred Cow from adverse remarks is natural enough in these days when the spokesmen for the Catholic church are specializing on an endeavor to convince the public that Catholicism and Americanism are the same thing; but the course taken by Magistrate Cobb, who ought to know better, and probably does, is unexplainable and ominous. The Sacred Cow is as sensitive to insult as a street-walker; to mention her without praise is always an "insult" to "sixteen million Catholics," who never appear to feel the disgrace when one of their number in their name commits acts of brutality against speakers exercising the ordinary right of free speech. Our magistrates are somewhat given to lecturing persons who appear before them either as defendants or complainants. How is it that they never improve the opportunity to instruct such misguided individuals as Miss Kenny, who discredit the fundamental principle of Americanism by bringing citizens into court to answer for doing what every citizen is at liberty to do if our constitutions mean what they say? Miss Kenny, when she "demanded" that some good American citizen stop Kerr, was guilty of disorderly conduct and instigating to violence. The magistrate should have so informed her. He should also have told her that the court could not convict any person for what he might say about the Catholic church; that she had no case against Kerr, and that the prisoner was discharged. After such instruction, with a proper rebuke administered for her exhibition of bigotry, Miss Kenny might have returned to Brooklyn a wiser and more thoughtful woman. As things turned out, she is no doubt confirmed in her fanaticism and ready for more mischief.

"Some Personal Recollections of Lincoln by a Friend and Neighbor" appear in the National Republican (Muncie, Ind.) under the signature of Col. E. T. Lee of Minneapolis. Colonel Lee, whom we have heard of before, is among those who attribute Christian piety to Lincoln. In these recollections he says, speaking of events that occurred in 1860:

"During the campaign, which was one of the most exciting this country has ever witnessed, Lincoln remained at home. I remember hearing him address several visiting delegations. Among those speeches was one of peculiar interest. He said: 'I know there is a God, and that he hates injustice and slavery. I see the storm coming, and I know that his hand is in it. If he has a place for me, and work for me (and I think he has) I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know I am right, because I know that liberty is right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God. I have told them 'a house divided against itself can not stand' and Christ and reason say the same, and they will find it so. Douglass doesn't care whether slavery is voted up or voted down, but God cares, and humanity cares, and I care, and with God's help I shall not fail; I may not see the end, but it will come, and I shall be vindicated, and these men will find that they have not read their Bibles right."

Is that speech fact or myth? Did Colonel Lee hear it or did he read it and incorporate it into his recollections? Of his sincerity we need not express a doubt, but how can we fail to suspect his memory in view of the fact that what he records as a speech by Lincoln is given in Holland's Life of Lincoln as part of an interview with the Hon. Newton Bateman? (See Rensburg's Lincoln, page 22.) Bateman may have fabricated the interview from the speech, or the speech may now be lifted from the interview. A few years ago we printed in fac simile Lincoln's own draft of the Gettysburg speech, from which the words "under God," the only theological allusion any version contains, are omitted. Colonel Lee saw the print and pronounced it not in Lincoln's handwriting, showing that he is prepared to go to some lengths to vindicate President Lincoln's perpetual piety. Such enthusiasm is always in danger of overreaching itself, and we fear the purported speech we have quoted from Colonel Lee's recollections is a case in point.

The number of Atheists and Agnostics disclosed by Professor Leuba's canvass of American men of science was the theme of an address delivered by Mayor Curley of Boston on February 13 at a Catholic reception in his home town. We get this from the Boston Journal of the following day:

"When we realize that more than 55 per cent. of the leading professors of our American colleges are Agnostics, Atheists and Infidels," said the mayor, "and that these are the men who teach the youth of America today, then we must rise in our might and stem this awful avalanche of paganism and Infidelity and guard our children from contamination."

"All this is true, absolutely true. This is the condition of education in America today, in spite of the fact that the father of our country, the immortal George Washington, declared 'Education without morality is anarchy.'"

"The very salvation of America is at stake, and its very existence as a nation under God is threatened. It is the duty of every Catholic to see that his children are trained in the moral code, that they receive religion with education. The clarion call has been sounded by our brilliant leader, Cardinal O'Connell, and under his leadership and his direction, we may hope to avert the threatened calamity and keep America in the future as it has been in the past, a nation under God."

There is here the usual and probably deliberate confusion between religion and morality. The charge against the "leading professors" is not that they are immoral men, and the matter of moral teaching is therefore lugged in without excuse. We have seen in our day and generation strict morality coexisting with utter disbelief in religion, and we have seen the most deplorable morals exhibited by men and women whose belief was beyond the reach of question or doubt. We do not believe that Cardinal O'Connell, whom Mayor Curley mentions, would gain anything for the cause of religion as an aid to morality were he to compare the morals of the Atheist college professors with any equal number of his own priests. But if the country is threatened by Agnosticism, what does Mayor Curley propose to do about it? Convert the Atheists to Catholicism? That is hardly practicable. His church knows but one method, and that is also impracticable in this case, for the church, though powerful, has not yet the influence to suppress altogether the freedom of teaching. In a country whose founders may be pointed to as the Agnostics of their day, the menace to its stability is not unbelief but a reactionary church and unscrupulous politicians adhering to and controlled by it.

Every now and then some ambitious individual seeks publicity by writing a letter to one of the great dailies complaining of the "bigotry of science." This attitude of mind shows an ignorance of the nature of both religion and science. Religion has as a basis, faith; but the basis of science is fact. Faith naturally develops bigotry because its pretensions are not verifiable on the grounds of knowledge; but science, on the contrary, is naturally devoid of bigotry, because its conclusions can never be accepted until their certainty has been demonstrated. The harmony of science and religion can never be accomplished, for the striking reason that the two different types of thought argue their case from totally different premises. Allowing that they both start with conjectures, their course becomes divergent before their goal is reached. Religion retains the same element of faith all through its development, its concluding notions remaining equally supposititious with those with which it started its career; but the one aim of science is to give reality to the ideas which it conceived as true, and if this be not possible, the suppositions are immediately dropped. There is much pseudo-science abroad in the world today. Like many another good thing, true science has had to contend not only with religious opponents but also with counterfeits of its own methods; and the person that would learn to appreciate the results of exact science must be careful to distinguish its results from those of scientific charlatanism. There is no such thing as the "bigotry of science."

The excellent behavior of the French priests in the present war has greatly aided in diminishing anticlerical bitterness in France. It would seem to indicate a revival of "religion" among the French people. Religion, in a broad sense, and the simple priest may indeed be stronger among the peasant population today than before the war, but this is problematical, and if a fact, does not point to any increasing strength on the part of the church. A writer in a recent number of the New Republic maintains that the church will be weaker after the war than before, owing to the failure of the pope to pronounce definitely upon the rights and wrongs of the war. The church has abrogated its rights of moral judgment. "It is the most astounding renunciation in history. Indubitably the Christian church took a wide stride from the kingship of God when it placed a golden throne for the unbaptized Constantine in the midst of its most sacred deliberations at Nicea. But this abandonment of moral judgments in the present case by the Holy See is almost a wider step from the church's allegiance to God." The imbecility of the pope to exert any power for the benefit of humanity, in a crucial stage of its history, is sufficient evidence of the depths of inefficiency to which the papacy has sunk in our day. This is one of the encouraging signs of the times. The time was when a word from the Christian Pontifex Maximus of Rome would have been obeyed with the willingness and alacrity that signalized a message from God; not so today. Today his voice is no more effective than that of some petty sovereign in a remote principality. The decay of papal power is the surest prophecy of the decline and ultimate death of Roman Catholicism.

A copy of a letter by Thomas Paine was placed on view by the American Art Association, New York, February 22. The letter, which is a part of the correspondence of President Madison with American statesmen and patriots, speaks of Paine's imprisonment in France and of the refusal of an election supervisor to allow him to vote in New Rochelle. A published part reads:

"Last year, 1806, I lived on my farm at New Rochelle; a man of the name Elijah Ward was supervisor that year. The father of this man and all his brothers joined the British in the war; but this one being the youngest and not at that time old enough to carry a musket, remained at home with his mother."

"When the election came on I tendered my tickets separately, as is the custom each of which Ward refused, saying 'You are not an American citizen.' Upon my beginning to remonstrate with him he replied, 'Our Minister at Paris, Governor Morris, would not reclaim you as an American citizen when you were imprisoned in the Luxembourg at Paris, and Gen. Washington refused to do it.' Upon my telling him that the two cases he stated were falsehoods and that if he did me injustice I would prosecute him, he got up and calling out for a constable said, 'I commit this man to prison.' He chose, however, to sit down and go no further with it."

The humiliation of Paine by a Tory supervisor is dealt with by Conway in the latter part of volume ii of his life. "It was the fate of this founder of republics," remarks Conway, "to be a monument of their ingratitude." In the Madison collection of which this Paine letter forms a part are original drafts of Thanksgiving proclamations by Madison and Washington. Madison's is in the handwriting of his wife Dolly, and Washington's in that of Alexander Hamilton.

Gen. Frederick Funston, commander of the United States troops on the Mexican border, who died last week, was a good soldier but a bad theologian, judged by orthodox standards. While on the border he was engaged in a controversy with the Rev. Dr. J. B. Gambrel, Baptist, who, as director of the State Mission Board of Texas, asked permission to invade the camp, to tell the soldiers they were lost and that he had come to save them. General Funston took issue with the Rev. Gambrel as to the lost state of his men, and declined to allow the Baptists of Texas and Georgia to carry on a revival in the midst of them. The tone of Dr. Gambrel's latest utterances on the subject indicates that in his opinion the future fate of Funston's soldiers is fairly well determined, and that in the after-world to which theology assigns them they will not be parted from their commander.

Hamil Grant, author of "Spies and Secret Service," has edited a book purporting to have been written by a private secretary of Crown Prince Rudolph of Austria, entitled "The Last Days of Archduke Rudolph," in which the assertion is made that the prince and Marie Vetsera were assassinated as the result of a conspiracy entered into by Pope Leo XIII, Cardinal Rampolla, the directorate of the Roman Catholic church at Rome, Emperor William of Germany and the Berlin government. The book is published by Dodd, Mead & Co., New York. The death of Prince Rudolph, who was regarded as too democratic by the central powers, took place a quarter of a century ago. According to the story he and the girl were shot by four Prussian agents through a window of the hunting-lodge at Meyerling. The account is not accepted with credence by some reviewers of the book.

More prejudice! The Hibernian (Catholic, Boston) declares: "We have maintained, and still maintain, that the present wave of prohibition is not the consequence of a natural moral upheaval, but the result of a deliberate combination of anti-Catholic prejudice and selfish commercialism." Are the Catholic church and the liquor traffic so closely identified that a movement against the one is a combination against the other? If so, we may soon hear of the arrest and conviction of the advocates of Prohibition, which would appear to be in the same hostility to the church as birth control, for "insulting" the Catholics of the country by noting the fact that they are opposed to it.

There is a movement in the town of Orange, New Jersey, to put the churches and their property on the tax list. The Rev. Dr. Adolph Roeder, president of Civics and pastor of the New Church, is at the head of the movement. Orange is enormously over-churched. The total valuation of real estate is $22,500,000, of which property valued at $2,591,000, or more than one-tenth, is exempted for church purposes. The exemption amounts to $50,000 a year in favor of the churches, some of which would have to pay as high as $1,400 annually. Dr. Roeder hopes that when the facts are presented to the churches they will tax themselves voluntarily—which is surprising.

The drastic prohibition bill in Congress which raised the question whether wine could be sent into dry states for communion purposes will need amendment, it is thought, to admit the Bible, since all publications "advertising" liquors are excluded from the mails, and the Bible is distinctly a wet book. The Old Testament recommends strong drink, and in the New the Apostle Paul, in a letter to Timothy, prohibits water as a beverage and directs that wine shall be taken instead. The Bible is freely used by the liquor men as a handbook of quotations for the bibulous.

It is announced that the Carnegie Corporation has appropriated about three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars to the pension system for the ministers of the Episcopal church. If Mr. Carnegie desires to do something handsome for the clergy, why does he not establish a foundation for the assistance of those who would like to stop preaching doctrines in which they no longer believe, but would thereby cut themselves off from their means of livelihood?

The results of Prof. J. H. Leuba's investigation of the beliefs of college students and men of science are given in his book, "Belief in God and Immortality," which readers of this paper have an opportunity to procure. How representative school children view these propositions is set forth this week in a study which Professor Leuba contributes to THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is a most valuable addition to knowledge and thought upon the subject.

The day's report on the clerical life: In Bayonne, N. J., a Greek priest, the Rev. John Krochmalny, was arrested while celebrating mass, charged with swindling a man in a stock deal. In Waterloo, Ind., the Rev. R. H. Puckett was put under a $5,000 bond, accused of a heinous crime against his 15-year-old daughter. In Hammond, Ill., the Rev. Frank Peyton was sentenced to imprisonment for life for killing his sweetheart.

Paine Memorial Hall, Boston, Mass., is chosen by Mr. and Mrs. Michael Thomas Rush of that city as the scene of the celebration this week, March 1, of their golden wedding anniversary. Mr. Brush, at the age of 73, is still an enthusiastic exponent of Freethought and active in combating its enemies. He has made a success of life, of work, and of marriage.

All the preachers in the world cannot prove that slavery is better than liberty. They cannot show that all have not an equal right to think. They cannot show that all have not an equal right to express their thoughts. They cannot show that a decent God will punish a decent man for making the best guess he can. This is all there is about it.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

He that will not reason is a bigot, he that cannot reason is a fool, and he that dares not reason is a slave.—Sir W. Drummond.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

E. L. MASTERS AND MATERIALISM

From Emil Nelson, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In an interview with Edgar Lee Masters, the Illinois poet whose Spoon River Anthology and other excellent work is bringing him renown, H. B. S., in the Chicago Daily News commences by quoting Masters to the effect that "the materialists—the Huxleys et al.—have not added much of real value to our store of genuine life knowledge," and he adds, "I don't know a material 'explanation' of life that is of any real value when followed to its ultimate conclusion."

Does Edgar Lee Masters or anybody else know of any "explanation" of life or anything else that is not "material" when followed to its ultimate conclusion? He doesn't give in his interview any clue as to where a non-material "explanation" can be found; and if he had or could would it have any real value?

It is true that Masters and a multitude of others—poets and philosophers—have with great beauty of word and phrase told us that we don't know it all and even been instrumental in convincing some of us of how little we know about ourselves and the universe in which we live; but neither is this an "explanation."

That which does not exist is non-material. Other than "material" explanations are immaterial.

He says: "There are realms high and beyond the conclusions of these men." No doubt: and let us be grateful to the men and women whose imaginations have given us inklings of what we may yet know and enjoy—the truths, ideals and Utopias yet to be.

John Tyndall warns to "be careful of pretending to know more about the mystery of the universe than is given to man to know," and those who have left too great a gap between material knowledge and the other kind, at the same time trying to pass their invention off for the real thing have, sooner or later, been recognized as impostors.

Imagination is one of the greatest and it is the finest faculty of the human mind: but imagination alone does not explain anything. It must be based upon the material to have any meaning. Tyndall says: "With accurate experiment and observation to work upon, imagination becomes the architect of physical theory," as it is the architect of all theory.

Masters goes on to say: "The trouble with the materialists is that they are earth-bound, that there are things which their eyes do not see. They have buried themselves in the mud and, grubbing away among the primary cells, they bubble up to us officially that the sun isn't shining any more. They're unhealthy."

It does appear that there are still unenlightened minds which have not been made aware of the fact that it has been only with the advance of material science that man has learned his true relation to the sun and his absolute dependence upon it. There are still those among us who are obstinately ungrateful enough to withhold credit from our plodding, grubbing scientist saviors. There are still those who do not know that plague and pestilence have receded, and that man enjoys better health as "materialistic explanations" gradually take the place of incantations and tricks of charlatans, spiritual or metaphysical.

Masters is not one of these, as he acknowledges, that "have made us more comfortable here and now."

Our poet then says he "wouldn't be surprised to hear at any time that an unquestioned connection had been made to prove or to disprove the existence of a future life. And I surely believe that they will prove it in the affirmative." "They," of course, must refer to materialistic explainers as for thousands of years non-material proofs have been advanced for a future life of which evidently none have convinced Edgar Lee Masters; probably because he can't "see it."

Religious apologists will jolly themselves along in recognizing in Masters another ally. When he says "Charles Darwin gave the Creator a dignity which he never had before," they will no doubt feel elated. They should feel grateful—to Darwin.

But when Masters gives the materialist credit as follows: "Best of all, they are steadily eliminating that most subtle enemy of progress—superstition," he acknowledges one of the greatest services to mankind on the part of materialists.

Preachers in quoting Masters will probably forget that statement.

Their trash-encumbered minds will garner all the chaff which tends to uphold their imposition and reject what hurts them.

They do not, like Emerson, "covet truth."

THE NEW RELIGION BUG.

From Geo. H. Long, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The editor well said that the idea of a new religion simply implies a desire of its advocates to substitute one superstition for another.

It seems to me that Rationalists mistake the mission of Freethought when they sigh for numbers and for power. I think Freethought is in itself the most powerful single agent in the world, for it acts just like the hand of Time, leveling one error, one despotism, one fallacy after another to the dust.

A religion implies an organization. An organization calls for a class, a caste, and the vanity of man feeds upon the power which is delegated to it.

I think that it would be a calamity to Freethought if it ever could be concentrated and organized into a unit obeying a single impulse. The ranks would soon be full of sharks and fakers, hypocrites and time-servers, and the movement would be open to every kind of scheme which craft and personal ambition could devise. Freethought is preeminently an individual matter. Its very nature tends to disrupt organization and parties and cliques. An idea no sooner begins to get set and fossilized than the skeptic, the heretic, the Freethinker comes along and puts the pry of reason under the entire mass and in a little while something begins to give way.

The heretic has always led the way from the old to the new. His faith has always been over the wreck of ancient institutions, through the dust and smoke of battle and fagot, often spilling his own blood along the way, but the flowers of civilization and progress have always sprung up in the soil thus prepared.

Freethinkers want to enjoy liberty. They are not dethroning superstitions and despots for the purpose of bending the knee to other masters.

From William Haskell, California.—I judge by "The Letter Box" that L. R., Pittsburg, Pa., wants to know "where the raw stuff in the Bible is found." He might try Gen. iii, 25; Deut. xxiii, 1; xxv, 11; Gen. xix, 32, 36; xxxviii, 9; Judges, xix, 24, 25, 29; 1 Saml. ii, 22; xix, 24; 1 Kings xxi, 21; 2 Kings vi, 25; 2 Kings xv, 16; 2 Chron. xxi, 15; Isaiah iii, 17; Hosea i, 2. 2 Kings xviii, 27, and Isaiah xxxvi, 12, are the same. If those are not "raw" enough, try Ezekiel iv, 12, 15.

ENCOURAGEMENT FOR FREETHINKERS.

From A. T. Heist, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

If any assurance were needed to satisfy the most exacting Freethinker that the Christian religion is on the wane, let him give a glance at the trend of public opinion and the actions of our friends the priests and preachers. See how they are forsaking the commandment, "Go ye into all the world preaching." Christ and him crucified has apparently lost all its power to attract the gullible, and the preachers of all descriptions are hunting other means of making a livelihood. Here it is railing against Socialism, there it is playing detective on gambling houses, and in other places prying out the redlight districts: anything to hold the attention of the herds, so they will come to the house of God and keep up their contributions to the "cause."

It would be a sad sight, if it were not so ludicrous—these servants of the Most High being chased from pillar to post, like so many common people. Do you know anybody who is sorry for them? They have lorded it over everybody for hundreds of years: no function was complete until "his reverence" was present; they have been the center of every gathering; they have bestowed their blessing or their curse at their own sweet will; they have browbeaten high and low; they have lied, cheated, stolen, tortured and cast into prison for the glory of their God, and now they are held in ridicule and contempt everywhere. How have the mighty fallen! I refer to an account of humiliating confession made by one of the leading preachers of Sacramento, who says: "Atheism prevails in the homes of many of this city's best citizens."

And again: "There is a certain antagonism among certain business men in this city toward church work, as conceived by those in charge of this work." And another preacher at the same function said: "The business men will not cooperate financially in a fight against vice conditions until the liquor evil has been wiped out." Hear ye, Israel! Did such humiliating confessions ever proceed from the "servants of god" in the good old times? Where is the spirit of the Inquisition and of the witch-burning days? Have Freethinkers any reason to bemoan hard times? I feel like going up to the housetop to do what the mixed preacher said Paul did—crow bitterly.

No doubt some of us have seen the humiliating spectacle the "reverend" gentleman who has been ventilating his knowledge of the scarlet woman has made of himself in San Francisco, and seen that he had forgotten to preach "Christ and him crucified" in order to show his foolish followers in that city that times have changed and men have changed since his "Lord and master" said of another scarlet woman: "Neither do I condemn thee." A sorry spectacle he presented when he had to admit, after hounding these women out of their haunts, that he had no remedy to offer them. With a savior who said "Whatsoever ye ask in my name it shall be done," this clergyman booby had no remedy!

Some of our Freethinkers are agitating for some kind of an "ism" which may be used by them as a substitute for Christianity, and which they may offer to tottering Christians and weak-kneed Freethinkers. So far as I can see, there is no need for such a thing. Rather let us explain the Christian religion to these Christians, and let common-sense do the rest. If we, as Freethinkers, will study the Chaldean system of astrology and present it to our neighbors and friends we shall see that all the old Bible stories and Bible heroes are stories relating to the motion of the heavenly bodies, and the heroes are the positions of the sun at different stages of its journey round the earth (as was then believed).

It explains all the most important incidents in these Bible stories in a far more sensible way than the way the Bible has humanized them. That stumbling-block de luxe, Jonah and the whale, is merely an astrological way of telling us that the sun seems to stand still for three days, March 20, 21 and 22, of each year, and that the constellation of the Great Fish is the one nearest the sun at that time, and is pictured as having swallowed the sun. The story of Christ being born in a stable on the 25th of December is merely a Chaldean astrologer's way of saying that the sun having reached its lowest point in the sign of Capricornus, the goat had begun its northward journey. The story of Daniel in the lion's den is a reference to the sun in the month of July, or Leo, the lion. Christ being crucified between two thieves is the story of the sun passing between Gemini, the twins. And that puzzler, the immaculate conception and the virgin birth is just the story of the sun passing through the constellation, Virgo, the virgin, and is the only virgin that could possibly give birth to a child and still retain her virginity. I hesitate to tell you of the Lamb of God, because it is so ridiculously simple that you will say of me as they said of Paul of old, "Much learning doth make thee mad." But, just the same, it is another astrologer's story cooked up to confuse the wise and has been revealed to babes and sucklings. You must know, then, that the sun crosses the heavenly equator in the month of March, and is said to be "crossified," or "crucified," and as he (the Sun) is in the constellation, Aries, the ram; he has displaced the last year's ram (his father) and is now known as the lamb. And Abram (from Abba, father) again offers up his son Isaac, according to one story, or Jesus dies to save the whole world, according to another. The Fatted Calf of the Prodigal Son story is just an astrologer's way of telling us that the Sun had passed through the sign of Taurus, the Bull of the month of April—the prodigal being the sun, which has journeyed all round the earth since he left home, and the father and brother being a personification of Gemini, the twins, of the month of May. I might explain the story of the three days' temptation in June, but would rather you would exercise a little study yourselves, as you will feel better if you work these things out alone. And, besides, this has already stretched itself too long for the columns of "Letters from Friends." But I wanted very much to write a word of encouragement to those down-hearted Freethinkers who are fighting to the best of their ability and see no evidence of progress in our midst. I hope I have succeeded.

MONISM AND GRAVITATION.

From Chas. W. Russell, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I acknowledge with pleasure the receipt of L. H. Magee's very interesting letter upon the subject of gravitation—the major mystery of modern science.

This young man displays powers of thought of a high order—and there are many such in the Rationalist movement.

It will not be necessary to offer a detailed criticism of Mr. Magee's theory of gravitation, for he has made the fundamental error of assuming the existence of an indivisible unit of matter—a theory long since discarded by the masters of physical science.

The concept of an indivisible unit of matter is now known to be an error. It is Monism which possesses the answer to the secret of gravitation and Monism itself is all but established as a fact.

Let us consider the evidence.

Light and heat are known to be fundamentally forms of wave-motion in the space-filling substance. This space-filling substance is called the ether. All known space is filled with this substance except where matter-forms exist. Where the ether is, matter is not. Where matter is, the ether is displaced.

Two substances cannot occupy the same space at the same time. And all space is completely filled with the space-filling substance or matter-forms. This is the first great lesson of modern scientific Monism, and Advanced Monism starts from this point.

It is known, and the evidence is now conclusive, that matter-forms are all composed of molecules, atoms and electrons.

From the phenomena of electricity, magnetism, electric conduction through gases and liquids, and radio-activity, we are able to establish the conclusion that all matter-forms are composed of electrons and nothing but electrons.

The electron is not an independent material unit immersed and moving in the ether substance, but it is, instead, a differentiation of that substance. How can this fact be known? For answer consult the current works upon radio-activity, electricity, magnetism, etc. The apparent mass and inertia of the electron are wholly electrical, which means, in simple language, that the electron is a tiny rotating sphere of the space-filling substance. It is very easy to prove that the electron is a differentiation of the space-filling, light-bearing substance, but the evidence is too voluminous to be offered just here. In my forthcoming book, "The World Riddle and Its Solution," the subject will be found fully treated. This book may be obtained from the book department of The Truth Seeker Company as soon as it is off the press.

From the evidence we are forced to the conclusion that nothing exists except the universal space-filling substance, the source of matter-forms and the source of the qualities, attributes, powers and limitations that matter-forms display. To comprehend gravitation we must learn all we can of the space-filling substance, since it is certain that nothing else exists.

All space is completely filled with the space-filling light and heat-bearing substance. Two substances cannot occupy the same space at the same time.

The space-filling substance, both in its primary phase and its secondary phase, as matter, is in violent motion everywhere.

Something cannot be derived from nothing, not even states of human consciousness. Motion is known to be as uncreatable as substance.

Both substance and energy, or motion, have always existed. Space has forever seen filled with a substance in violent motion, and it is violent beyond all human comprehension.

That which occupies no space at all is nothing at all. Every existent reality is a phase of the space-filling substance or an attribute, quality or power of that substance. Within the limits of human reason and experience, there is no way to evade this tremendous deduction.

We must also note that the space-filling substance occupies a pure vacuum. We must note also that it is a fluid. The "gas-free space" of the chemist and the physicist is no vacuum. The space-filling substance cannot be removed from any portion of space. Where should we put it, since all space is completely filled? How do we know that all space is completely filled with this single substance? For answer study the phenomena of light, heat and electric radiation in general.

It can be proved with absolute certainty, and you may work out the problem for yourself, that no energy or power is lost or absorbed in the process of moving a fluid in a vacuum. Only motion offers resistance to motion, and it is in this fact that we find the solution of the great problem of gravitation.

Gravitation is a pull or a push. You can see that the ether substance alone cannot transmit either a pull or a push. How can it? To transmit a pull, since it is a fluid, it will have to "shorten up" or occupy less space between any two objects. To exert a push it must tend to flow toward or against the two objects which are subject to the force called gravitation.

The ether substance cannot flow and it cannot be shortened up, as it were, and hence it is certain that the ether substance itself alone is not the cause of gravitation. There must be something, then, within the ether substance that transmits the pull or the push, called gravitation.

Of all the qualities, attributes and powers of the space-filling substance only one can act to cause the force called gravitation. Only the energy or motion stored in the space-filling substance can cause either a pull or a push.

There are hydrogen atoms upon the earth which have existed with absolute certainty for the past ten or fifteen billion years. If the space-filling substance offered the very slightest resistance to motion, these atoms would have long since been torn apart and reduced to their simple elements, as it were.

The ether substance alone can offer no resistance to motion, but the motion stored in the ether substance can supply what the ether alone does not possess. The motion stored in the ether substance offers resistance to every phase of motion with which it is in step.

But balance the motion in any system of revolution and the system can thereafter endure forever, and this is no idle guess, but a fact. We assume that everything which had a beginning must have an end, but this does not follow by any means. To reason correctly we must be sure we have all the factors.

An atom of hydrogen stores very little kinetic energy, or energy of revolution or translation, and yet it exists for billions of years. If the atom of hydrogen can exist for billions of years with its very slight inertia and contained energy, how much longer may a solar system exist?

Certain scientists of the first rank have assumed that all atoms are disintegrating, as are the atoms of uranium, radium, etc. This, too, is now known to be an error. The fact is that certain atoms of great complexity must disintegrate because many of their sub-atoms are still in step with current forces passing through the ether substance, but this is the exception and not the rule. I have cleared up this point in my book.

So far as the ether substance is concerned, the solar system may easily endure for all time yet to come. It is true that the sun is losing its heat, and it is "theoretically" possible that the solar system may collide with some other such system in space, but the case is by no means as hopeless as it appears.

Of course, I am biased, since I believe that evolution leads to personal, individual immortality as well as to racial immortality, but my belief is founded upon a mass of evidence that is not to be despised.

However, we have stepped to one side of our problem.

There are two phases of motion in the space-filling substance—the primary or intrinsic energy and the secondary or derived energy.

Gravitation is due to the primary or intrinsic energy of the ether substance, acting upon matter-forms as centers of secondary energy or motion.

But I must not use up too much space at one time. This is an immense subject, and it is better to offer the evidence in small installments.

MR. WASHBURN APPRECIATED.

From T. Westervelt, Michigan.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As you must know I have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for quite a number of years. When I received it to-day, February 10, and read Mr. Washburn's article on the first page, I said, that is the clear "stuff," that is the plain common everyday talk that the common people can understand.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has a lot of good writing, and it would be robbing me of half of my life if I had to do without it; but it takes us old readers to get the pleasure out of those brainy articles, they are so deep for the common folk, the people we wish to benefit. I wish it were possible to have Mr. Washburn's article put in a circular. I wouldn't like any better fun than to hand them out. I am acquainted with a lot of business men and also working people who have never read the Bible and perhaps never will, who support the church more or less, and it seems to me that Mr. Washburn's article is so plain, so easily read that it would convert the common person, and also make the minister ashamed of his occupation.

CLERICAL DEFICIENCIES.

From E. B. Cook, Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I see by the wrapper date my year is up. To say your paper has done a grand work, would be putting it mild. I am pleased with a whole lot who have contributed to its columns!

I think the paper was established as an opponent to the erroneous teachings and fallacies of the Bible. I believe those who contribute to its columns should keep that in mind, as some men would glory in destroying it as a propagandist paper.

The churches are noted as underhanded, dishonest and deceitful; they are not satisfied with fifty-two Sundays in the year, and Sunday schools, Bible classes; they resort to the other spasmodic system so thoroughly engrafted all over the country by instituting the big-mouthed evangelist, to hog-wash the people. What a pity such a thing as Bill Sunday can preach his hog-wash and get such pay for his lies! Not a reasonable thing in it? He is a suitable instrument in the estimation of the "cloth" to bring people to Christ. I think it reflects on the ministry of all Boston or any other city that have to import such an impostor. As for me, I would not belittle my profession if I had one.

Sunday is not a real, good moralist, let alone his religious fad. He is not honest enough to give credit to those he pillages from. An honest man would give credit to the one he borrows from. I had occasion not long since of telling one of them that as a class they out-classed any class in this country for bad deeds. He said to me, "Where do you get that, sir?" I replied: "62 Vesey Street, New York City." He wanted to know the name. I told him "Crimes of Preachers." He said he would send for it. How it would open his eyes to read those charges of crime from those so-called pure teachers of innocent young people to a higher and noble life! I like to read L. K. W.'s short hits; my! but he is a good one! More like him is my idea of a man.

BLAINE ON GARFIELD.

From J. C. Boren, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The following is an extract from a memorial address, on The Life and Character of James A. Garfield, by Hon. James G. Blaine, delivered before the two houses of Congress, Feb. 27, 1882: "The crowning characteristic of General Garfield's religious opinions, as, indeed, of all his opinions, was his liberality. In all things he had charity. Tolerance was of his nature. He respected in others the qualities which he possessed himself—sincerity of conviction and frankness of expression. With him the inquiry was not so much what a man believes, but does he believe it."

"The lines of his friendship and his confidence encircled men of every creed and men of no creed, and to the end of his life, on his ever lengthening list of friends, were to be found the names of a pious Catholic priest and of an honest-minded and generous-hearted Freethinker."

A WORD FROM ARIZONA.

From F. D. H., Arizona.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I would like to say a few words in praise of our paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think it the best all-round paper I have ever read. It is choke full of educational and rational reading matter. If one would compare THE TRUTH SEEKER with religious papers they could very readily discern the higher intelligence of the free-minded writer. I see that Liberalism is slowly growing in my neck of the woods. The fast developing little city of Yuma has two daily papers and the editors of each are very liberal and progressive.

At two different times I have left a number of TRUTH SEEKERS at the office of the Morning Sun. When I get my Liberty pin I will visit Yuma and strut upon the streets.

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and all connected with it!

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Charles Watts, February 27, 1835-February 16, 1906.

The contributions of England to the cause of Rationalism in America have been valuable, but none so much so as the distinguished Freethought lecturer and debater, Charles Watts. Mr. Watts was born in Bristol, England, February 27, 1835. Bristol is a Methodist stronghold. Here John Wesley found his strongest support for Methodism, obtained his first property, and here Mr. Watts's father was located as a Methodist minister. The lad

Charles grew up under Methodist influence, and was intended, like his father, for the clerical profession. He early took prizes in Sunday school for Bible knowledge and proficiency in other respects. When a youth he went to London and learned the printer's trade, and there met Charles Southwell and other Freethought leaders. He began to read, with the result that he became an Atheist. In 1859 he became acquainted with Charles Bradlaugh, who was then writing and lecturing under the nom-de-plume of "Iconoclast." Mr. Bradlaugh had published a paper called the Investigator, which had suspended publication. Mr. Watts's brother, John Watts, started the National Reformer, which on his death, in 1864, passed into the hands of Mr. Bradlaugh with Charles Watts as sub-editor. Mr. Watts had early shown an aptitude for public speaking, having delivered his first lecture in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors when he was but fifteen years old. He also had dramatic talent, and appeared in many amateur performances. As the Freethought cause engrossed his attention, nothing was more natural than that he should go on the Freethought platform, and he became special lecturer for the National Secular Society. But his great forte was as a debater. In this he was clear, logical, eloquent in stating his own positions and quick at seeing the weak points of opponents. Forty or fifty years ago ministers would meet Freethinkers in joint discussion. Now it is almost impossible to find one of knowledge and ability who will do so. During his lifetime Mr. Watts held about one hundred debates. Among his opponents were such distinguished Christian advocates as the Rev. George Sexton, the Rev. Dr. McCann, the Rev. Brewin Grant, the Rev. Dr. Harrison, and the Rev. Alexander Stewart, as well as many lesser lights of the church. Some of his debates with the above-named clergymen have been published and make interesting reading. He was always ready for a discussion with any minister of standing, but few cared to meet him. While always a gentleman, the intellectual castigation which his opponents would receive at his hands was something terrible to behold. In 1877, owing to differences in methods of work, Mr. Watts and Mr. Bradlaugh separated, Mr. Watts, to better carry out his ideas, organizing the British Secular Union, and establishing, in conjunction with W. Stewart Ross, the Secular Review. In 1883 he made his first lecture tour to the United States and Canada, lecturing in the principal cities and being well received wherever he went. In 1887, on the invitation of the Freethinkers of Toronto, Canada, he located in that city, where he established Secular Thought, lecturing Sunday evenings and occasionally making tours into the states. While in America, he was, next to Ingersoll, the most popular Freethought lecturer, and wherever he went drew large audiences. In 1891, after the death of Mr. Bradlaugh, he received an urgent invitation to return to England, and again take up the work there. He accepted, settled in London, and was active on the platform until a few weeks before his death, February 16, 1906. However, he did not forget the United States. He liked the country and the people, who had the pleasure of hearing him on his visits in 1893, 1896, 1898 and 1902. Mr. Watts was twice married, his second wife, Kate Eunice Watts, being a very accomplished woman and truly a helpmeet to him in his work. He had three daughters and two sons, the oldest of the latter, Charles A. Watts, being now at the head of the great English Freethought publishing company, the Rationalist Press Association.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

- Feb. 25, Sir Christopher Wren died, 1723.
- G. W. Foote, editor London Freethinker, imprisoned for blasphemy, released, 1884.
- Feb. 26, Victor Hugo born, 1802. Thomas Spence, tried for selling "Rights of Man," acquitted, 1793. Shaftesbury, Freethinker, born 1671.
- Feb. 27, Ernest Renan born, 1823. Longfellow born, 1807. Elias Hicks, Quaker, died, 1830.
- Feb. 28, M. E. Montaigne, skeptic, born 1533. Lamartine died, 1869.
- March 1, Freeman of Pocasset, Mass., sacrifices his child in imitation of Abraham, 1879.
- March 1, Williams pilloried for publishing "North Briton," 1769. Badby burnt for heresy, 1409.
- March 2, Bradlaugh elected to Parliament for third time, 1882.
- March 3, W. K. Clifford died, 1879. Decision against Underwood, Crookston et al indicted for blasphemy, Irwin Station, Pa., affirmed, 1884.

"Long Distance" Message Proposed.

A party of county officials from one of coal-mining districts of Pennsylvania went to New England upon a junket. Included among the tourists was the newly elected sheriff, a large, solid, self-made man, who hated to walk when he could ride.

When the party reached Portland he was in a state of exhaustion. After a morning devoted to sightseeing the visitors sat in a room at the hotel, planning fresh excursions for the afternoon. The sheriff rested upon the bed. He was favoring his feet.

"I'll tell you what," suggested one of the group. "Henry W. Longfellow was born in this town. Let's go and call at his home."

"Where is this here Longfellow's place?" inquired the sheriff.

"Not far," said the first speaker—"half a mile or so."

"Haven't we better telephone first, to see if he's home?" suggested the sheriff.

Attractive Goods.

An elderly lady entered a shop and asked to be shown some tablecloths. The salesman brought a pile and showed them to her, but she said she had seen those elsewhere—nothing suited her.

"Haven't you something new?" she asked.

The clerk then brought another pile and showed them to her.

"These are the newest pattern," he said. "You will notice that the edge runs right around the border and the center is in the middle."

"Isn't that lovely!" said the lady. "I will take half a dozen of those."

Unselfishness.

Suppose life was only a battle for self,
And nobody pitied or gave,
And none of the dead who have journeyed ahead,

Neither scholar, nor soldier, nor knave,
Ever thought of the children that followed him on

Or toiled without claiming his fee,
Can't you picture to-day as you go on your way

What a horrible world it would be?

If nobody cared whether others survived,
Or whether or not they were glad;
If each of us here labored year after year
For only the gold to be had;

If life were but striving for raiment and food,
Then the beasts in the field that we see
Would be one with the plan that is fashioned for man

And a horrible world it would be.

But the joys that we know and the charms that we claim

Are ours because somebody cared;
The pleasures we boast of and treasure the most

We own because somebody dared.
The dead have gone on leaving us to be glad

In the gardens they planted, and we must leave something behind, for the future to find;

We must work for the ages to be.

Do Figures Lie?

"Abe," said Mawruss, "seems to me, y'understand, that working as hard as I do I oughter be gettin' more money."

"Well, now, Mawruss, let's see," said Abe, "there are three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, ain't it?"

"Sure," said Mawruss.

"Well, then, eight hours a day you are asleep, ain't you?"

"Sure," said Mawruss.

"Well, eight hours is one-third of the day, and one-third of three hundred and sixty-five is one hundred and twenty-two days, and that leaves two hundred and forty-three days, ain't it?"

"Of course," said Mawruss.

"Well, eight hours a day you be loafing, ain't you? and eight hours a day is another third-day off, that makes one hundred and twenty-two days?"

"That's right," said Mawruss.

"Well, one hundred and twenty-two days from two hundred and forty-three days is one hundred and twenty-one, ain't it?"

"That's so," said Mawruss.

"Well, you know every Sunday we close down, and that makes fifty-two days, and one hundred and twenty-one minus fifty-two makes it sixty-nine, ain't it?"

"That's right," said Mawruss.

"Well, then, we also been closin' Saturday half holiday all through the year, ain't it, and that makes twenty-six days, and twenty-six off sixty-nine makes forty-three days, ain't it?"

"Sure," said Mawruss.

"Well, then, two weeks of the year you been loafin' on a vacation, and that makes fourteen days, and fourteen days off forty-three days leaves twenty-nine days."

"It is," said Mawruss.

"And there was another two weeks when you said you were buying goods, and was being showed a good time by those cloak and suit fellows, and can't count that, and that makes fourteen and fourteen from twenty-nine leaves fifteen days, ain't it?"

"Sure," said Mawruss.

"And now I been noticin' you been takin' an hour off for lunch every day, and that makes fourteen days off fifteen days leaves one day."

"It does," said Mawruss.

"Well, I know you didn't work that day," said Abe, "cause that was Rosh Hashana."

The Logical Professor.

The absent-minded professor had gone to the barber's for a shave; after the operation he continued to occupy the chair; the barber thought he must have fallen asleep, and respectfully asked whether this were so. "No, my good man," he said, "I am not asleep. The fact is I am frightfully nearsighted. When I took my glasses off I was no longer able to see myself in the mirror opposite. Naturally, I supposed I had already gone home."

Sent It Home.

Over the garden fence the conversation had suddenly turned acrimonious.

"An' if yore boy, 'Erbert, ties any more cans to our pore dog's tail," was Mrs. Moggins's stern ultimatum, "'e'll 'ear about it, that's all. Oh, an' per'aps you've done wiv that saucepan wot you borrowed last Monday."

"'Erbert," asked Mrs. Grubb shrilly, "wot 'ave you bin doin' to Mrs. Moggins's dog?"

"Nothin', ma!" replied the small boy, unblushingly.

"There!" said his mother triumphantly.

"An' you returned 'er saucepan yesterday, didn't you, dearie?"

"Sent it back by 'er dog!" said 'Erbert calmly.—Chicago News.

A Natural Phenomenon.

He was sentimental—she was practical. He was poetical as they walked through the gloaming and talked of the stars, while she was thinking, seriously thinking, of her future "daily bread." "Why do these persimmon trees give forth such mournful sounds as the gentle zephyrs play through their tops, my darling?" asked he. "I don't know, George, but I should imagine that if you were as full of green persimmons as they are you would be apt to give forth 'mournful' sounds, too." Then a silence, such as could be felt, settled upon the scene, and they slowly drifted apart.

Fleeting Bliss.

First Young Idea—Say, we don't have to go to school or church or Sunday-school any more. Ain't this infantile disease great.

Second Ditto—Yes, but the doctors say it ain't a-goin' to last.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

Address, The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street - New York

THE LETTER BOX.

K., Los Angeles, and Others.—Communications for Mr. Washburn should be addressed to him at 19 Tuckerman, Revere, Mass. He has not been in New York for fifteen years.

F. C. H., Pennsylvania.—Mr. J. E. Remsburg resides at Potter, Kan. Woolsey Teller may be addressed in care of this office. Gen. William Birney died some years ago.

E. CUFF, Washington.—If we wanted an editor to print something we had written we should not approach him with a statement of our suspicion that "financial reasons" dictated his choice of contributions published. The only question is whether such contributions are available.

J. D. T., M. D., Boston.—The idea of an index to the year's contents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be published in the last number in December, is agreeable to us, but we shrink from the labor of preparing it. For our own use we keep track of articles, in a limited way, by means of a card index, which we take a half-hour weekly to prepare.

A. D. STONEMAN, Iowa.—The presence of the two young women in the entourage of the Burning Bush preacher is a privilege founded upon an apostolic custom. See 1 Cor. ix, 5: "Have we not power to lead about a sister?" Also compare Luke viii, 1-3: "And the twelve were with him, and certain women," which ministered to him of their substance."

E. C. W., New York.—The omission of the name of Mr. Joseph Rinn as one of the speakers at the last meeting of the Sunrise Club was wholly inadvertent, and occurred after some strenuous effort on our part to get the notice in and have it right. Rinn is the salt of the earth, the best of what you call the "bunch." We reserve our opinion of the turpitude of the party responsible for his name's being left out.

C. H. ESHLEMAN, Michigan.—We, like you, have worried some over what might be the effect on the morals of others of reading matter that never gave us a thought for our own, nor made us better or worse. Perhaps, after all, others are as robust as ourselves, and our apprehensions are unfounded. We will convey to Mr. Kusel your remark that the morals of his letter are those of the tenderloin. Comparative morality is a subject which has engaged the attention of the best specimens of our imperfect race.

MARTIN ANDERSON.—We supposed we had the poets discouraged, or that after our appeal to their better natures they would withhold the verses they were impelled to commit to paper, or send them somewhere else. But today we have to admit that the inflow of poetry at this office is larger than at any previous time since we began receiving it. We have printed the best of it, and now give yours, not necessarily as representing the other extreme:

"Glory! to the Lords in their secret courts
Who prank with their bipeds in all kinds of sports
The very very Gods as far as man can observe
Keep intact in glory your Pluto and Minerva."

THE HAND OF GOD

and Other

Posthumous Essays

By

GRANT ALLEN

Most intelligent Freethinkers are familiar with Mr. Grant Allen's work, "The Evolution of the Idea of God," but fewer have read his supplementary book called "The Hand of God," in which he intended to explicate further some personal views regarding the origin of religion. The book takes its name from the opening chapter, which, with the three chapters on "The Worship of Death," were designed to be the opening section of a volume supplemental to the better known work. The book under present notice, consists of fifteen essays of striking and permanent interest. Here are some of the titles: "Immortality and Resurrection," "The Mystery of Birth," "What is the Object of Life," "Practical Religion," and "Spencer and Darwin." Grant Allen needs no special introduction to the Rationalist, but in this little volume he appears at his best—highly interesting, always instructive, and fascinating to a degree. There are few books of essays of higher merit, especially for the liberal minded, than "The Hand of God."

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Poverty and Riches and Mr. Donahue.

Since our old friend Steffee used to air his views in the department of economics, nothing has appeared that revealed such inability to think and reason clearly from facts and realities as B. G. Donahue's article. How a man in his right senses can present such statements for acceptance or consideration as he does, passes comprehension.

He begins by saying we all have the same rights and privileges, and the rich become rich by their own individual efforts. Theoretically we all have certain rights; that is, just claims to freedom of action in procuring a living on this old earth, but where and how can those rights be exercised under the laws and customs that govern society? There are thousands of men in California that want work by which they can get food, clothing and shelter for their bodies; but they cannot find the opportunity to work, though they have a theoretical right. If there is no demand for their services under the capitalistic system, where every foot of land in the state is private property, or under government control, and one cannot step off the highways without trespassing, what does Mr. Donahue advise a hungry and homeless man to do? When he says all men have the same privileges he apparently does not consider what "privilege" means, for the dictionary says it is a peculiar advantage, or a right not general; so a thing that is not general does not reach all men. Had he used the word opportunity he would have still made himself ridiculous, for there is not, and never was, such a thing as equal opportunities in any civilized state of society on earth.

Our county jail had 318 inmates on Christmas day, and nine-tenths of them have been forced into it from inability to make a living by honest labor in any department of industry; for we are not making war munitions out here to give men employment; so if Mr. D. will tell the men out here in large numbers who want work and cannot obtain it, what to do, he will render great service to his fellow men; for suicides were never more common than now, and people have been killing themselves ever since I came to the state 34 years ago.

As to riches being the result of individual efforts, what does that really mean? Did any individual ever get rich by and through his own labor? No; and no one ever will. Carnegie says the man who does the work never gets rich, and we know how he made his millions. A man bought a lot here on Broadway some years ago and hung onto it until the increase in population added $30,000 to its value. His "own individual efforts" had about as much to do with it as Baruch's in Wall street the other day when stock speculations won him a million dollars. Think how hard Tom Lawson worked to get his millions, and John D. to add to his—playing golf. Mr. Donahue refers to him and Woolworth, and says thousands of other men have done nearly as well, and any man who will "work" as doggedly and persistently as they did will attain the same results. I suggest that he make the effort right away and prove to a skeptical lot of TRUTH SEEKER readers that he knows what he is talking about. I always did admire the man who was loaded with advice for success in making money and getting ahead in the world, because of his nerve, for all I have ever seen or heard talk, had no property and were paying rent to some landlord, and even Steffee admitted he was trying to eke out an existence dabbling in real estate, though he knew the road to wealth and how to get there.

Nothing would please me more than to see him and Comrade Donahue drop off the train some day here in Los Angeles without a cent in their pockets, for what they could do, or would try to do, would be of deep interest. We are looking for tourists right now with a good fat wad made out of war munitions, to fill up our empty houses and buy gilt-edged real estate, for we are striving desperately to revive the game we know so well how to play; but any man dead broke, as Jesus always was, gets the glassy eye and the icy hand if he comes, and the best thing he can look for is two eight-cent meals a day in one of our jails, where he will soon land if he does not move on; and let it be known, bed covering nights is rather scanty with the frosts God is now sending, for one of our boarders at public expense set fire to his blankets recently to get warm.

Under the capitalistic system men find work when a profit can be made on their labor, but we now have so many vacant stores, and empty bungalows lost from inability to keep up instalment payments, the sound of the saw and the hammer is not very common. So just how men could utilize Brother Donahue's advice to make their income more than cover their expenses, when they have no income, will need supplementary advice before his wise remark can be effectively utilized. Hear, hear. It would also be interesting to know why we have three classes of society as he admits—the rich, the middle and the working class—if "all men have the same rights and privileges." Do cunningly devised laws have anything to do with the great inequalities we see, or do they result from "laziness, improper eating, drinking, sleeping, incontinence, anger and thoughtlessness"? Yours for information so it can be imparted to those who need it in the struggle to exist. CHANNING SEVERANCE.

MISS BRUNZELL IS ANSWERED

Behold, a new champion hath entered the lists: a fresh gladiator is in the arena, and this time, one who cordially invites me to "come again." For the peace of mind of my new adversary, I will at once assure her that I shall always be on hand when feminine lack of logic tempts me forth. Therefore, she may expect to see me often—in print—and therefore I am here today.

My latest opponent in reference to my criticisms of woman first proceeds to state that "it appears to me as sensible to thrash a consumptive because he is a consumptive." That would surely be the height of foolishness, as long as the consumptive recognized his unfitness and did not hinder the march of able-bodied men; but when the consumptive insists upon shouldering a musket and endeavoring to march shoulder to shoulder with the fit, thereby falling in the road and tripping up his abler comrades, then it is time to intimate to the consumptive in terms varying with his degrees of obstinacy, that his room is better than his company, and he is nothing but a nuisance. The position is analogous with that of the modern woman, whose determination to shoulder the political musket is a deliberate perversion of her natural talents, and a positive danger to the welfare of the race.

Secondly, my opponent admits that woman is still an abject slave. The truth of this admission I have attempted to prove; its terseness I could not better myself, and for it I am much obliged.

Now says Miss Brunzell: "Let us examine woman's physical inability to cope with man. . . . Havelock Ellis has informed us that among savage and semi-savage people the female is not only equal to man in strength and size of body, but is partly superior." Miss Brunzell proceeds to point out the painlessness and facility of childbirth among Indian squaws, and concludes: "But this natural mother has never known corsets or the sweat-shops, so why should not the natural law of birth work its natural course?"

Why, indeed, should not the natural law of birth work its natural course? Partly, I am prepared to admit, through the false system of economics that prevails, but chiefly through the ignorance and frivolity of the very civilized women who boast their remoteness from the aboriginal as rendering them peculiarly fit for the logical exercise of the vote. "But this natural mother has never known corsets." Quite so; and be it observed, this "natural mother," free of the degenerate craving for unnaturalness evinced by the preference for a corseted figure, free of the callousness to the well-being of the future generations that this persistence in corset-wearing reveals, is also free of the hysterical craving for political notoriety that is rendering her civilized sisters a crew of loud-voiced, raw-boned nondescripts. Natural! "I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word." These savage and semi-savage women are in truth the natural mothers of the race, whereas the modern woman, neurotic, hysterical, erotic, fanatical, is as unnatural as the depths of mental and moral degeneration can render her.

Miss Brunzell has taken particular exception to my postulation of the likelihood of the future generation, in the event of their mothers assuming the arduous duties of practical politics, being born with faces like Bills or Petitions; and she suggests that it is perhaps better that they be born with features resembling scrub-brushes or frying-pans. This suggestion exhibits a great lack of psychological and physiological knowledge on the part of my opponent. Woman, with her peculiarly delicate mental equilibrium, and the particularities of physique that make her the mother of the race instead of the father, is utterly unfitted for any sphere wherein logic, level-headedness and calculation are the most desirable attributes. She becomes at once a zealot, a fanatic; is actuated by subtle dislikes and preferences; reduces everything from the general to the particular, and from the impersonal to the extremely personal. Imagine a pregnant woman in the environment productive of such a frame of mind. The effects upon her unborn child would, of necessity, be most injurious. But devotion to household duties, the natural sphere of the mothers and comforters of mankind, does not tend to fanaticism and to combat; the household environment, where the woman is tactful, delicate and womanly, is one of peace and rest; and though its duties be trying and never-ending, yet in their naturalness there is nothing to wreak ill upon the unborn child. So that while there is some ground for my objection to have the rising generation perambulating Congressional Records, there is none for Miss Brunzell's parallel of the bi-pedal hardware store.

Now comes the following: "Has not the church in the past ever sought to frustrate the efforts of women to enter the scientific and political field?" Certainly, ever since the time when woman, in her innate slavishness, threw in her lot with the underlings and failures of Rome, and founded the Christian church. Let not woman bemoan the inferior status to which the church has consistently consigned her, for the tyrant, in the beginning, was largely of her own raising, and today is almost entirely of her own supporting. It is characteristic of woman that she is ever extremely active in creating a situation obnoxious to her, and then is persistent and lachrymose in looking around for sympathy and support, saying: "For heaven's sake, behold the injustice that is dealt out to me!"

Miss Brunzell observes: "By 'subtle' I understand artfulness and craftiness." I keenly regret that it is not in my power to develop the lady's understanding, but at least I can inform her that the words "delicate" and "refined" are also among the definitions of the term she disposes of so summarily. It is doubtful if "our law-makers have given us enough of that." And it is even more than doubtful whether woman's entry into political life will not tend rather to deprive her of those attributes than to infuse them into her public dealings. Woman is very chameleon-like in character. Her mind takes the color of the mental cushion it sits on. And it is always on a cushion, for it cannot, in its very nature, stand hard wood. The instance of Mrs. Besant, whose wonderful mind inevitably turned from the coldness of definite Atheism to the fantastic warmth of Theosophy, is but one among many; and the woman of average mind clings even more tenaciously to some mystic consolation or other, either admittedly or secretly, almost subconsciously, indulged, to soften for her the logical facts of a life with which she is not fitted publicly to cope.

Says Miss Brunzell: "If woman is fit to teach and plant the seed of righteousness in her young son's mind, who may be a future President, is not the mother as fit to occupy the President's chair?" Dear lady, the Missing Link fed, cared for, and taught, according to its lights, its young that was to be man, but the Link itself, while worthy in every respect as a Link, was yet not man. The mother of Alfred the Great inculcated in her son the precepts of Plain Living and High Thinking, so to speak, and Alfred profited accordingly; but with the queen-mother it ended at inculcation, while the virile son, the silver of her precepts, was transmuted into the gold of vivid action. And there you have the two spheres clearly defined.

Miss Brunzell makes the following admission and protest: "Mary, you have spanked us and we did not deserve it." In my opinion, any man or woman who can be spanked, deserves to be spanked. If ever occasion arises wherein I may truthfully confess that I have been spanked, I shall hold my tongue; for in suffering the onslaught, I shall have proved my deserts of it, and no one admits he got what he deserved. MARY MONICO.

MORE ABOUT MICROBES.

I read with interest Mr. Perry's remarks about the possibility of the human race becoming hairless by mechanical means. However, I believe that the force which is to cause variation must affect the nutrition of the individual before variation results.

Men have been cutting off the tails and lopping the ears of dogs for generations, but this has not produced a stub-tailed and stub-eared bulldog. This would amount to the same thing as the eradication of hair by mechanical means.

The microbes which would cause variation and thus produce new varieties or species would affect the nutrition, thus causing a fundamental change; and in the case of the hair, the hair would disappear from the whole body instead of in places.

My idea is that hairlessness has in great part been brought about much as has the American type of women. American men are called the slaves of their women, and I think most any one will agree that the ideal of a woman entertained by the average American man is a small, dainty, "cute little armful," while the American woman has sought a powerfully built, aggressive "protector." The result has been that we have produced a type of woman unable properly to function for the perpetuation of the species and our inborn ideas have rendered us reluctant to change to the big framed and masterful woman.

Were we to use breeders' methods and mate with a view to produce more powerfully built, if less "cute" and dainty, women we would probably have less hysterics, fewer pet dogs, and fewer men cooking their own breakfasts and coming home nights to assist with the wash and fewer men engineering the nursing bottle for the almost extinct heirs to the freedom for which our fathers bled.

I do not think Mr. Perry's explanation is effective, neither do I think that the present method of limiting the family to one or two spoiled darlings is going to result in an improvement in the race.

My idea is that if the economic situation was changed so that a fair-sized family could be properly reared, the results would be far better for the offspring and for the nation. GEO. H. LONG.

THE SERVICE OF MAN

By JAMES COTTER MORISON

This is a book of peculiar interest, written by a man of striking personality. The object of the book is to show how the Service of God, or of Gods, leads by natural evolution to the Service of Man; from Theology to Anthropology. Mention of some of the chapter headings will show the attractive nature of the work. Chapter II deals with "The Decay of Belief"; Chapter IV with "The Alleged Consolations of the Christian Religion"; Chapter VI is named "Morality in the Ages of Faith"; and in the VIIth chapter there is recorded "What Christianity Has Done." There are in all nine chapters of clear and accurate reasoning in favor of the glorification of man over a decadent laudation of gods. The book is framed in an admirable spirit, and exhibits on every page the generous nature and lively vivacity of its author. It is invaluable to the student of Rationalism, especially if he be called upon to "give a reason for the faith that is in him."

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. The announcement that we have it is sufficient.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Next!—The Flirt: "How do you like my new engagement ring?"
"Fine! When does it come off?"

Speed Madness.—"A dollar doesn't go as far as it used to."
"No," replied Mr. Chuggins, cheerily; "but it goes a lot faster."

The Human Variety.—Sapleigh: "I like a girl who can take a joke."
Miss Keen: "Then you stand a splendid chance of being accepted."

Oh, Slops!—"My wife is queen of the tea-table," remarked a host to a friendly visitor. "And she never reigns, but she pours," was the quiet reply.

A Blunt Remark.—"Maria, you'll never be able to drive that nail with a flat-iron. For heaven's sakes, use your head," admonished Mr. Stubbins. And then he wondered why she would not speak to him the rest of the day.

"It's an Ill Wind."—Mrs. Green: "They seem to think the war will be over very soon now, Mrs. 'Arris."
Mrs. Harris: "I shouldn't be surprised, Mrs. Green; twenty-five shillings a week and me 'usband away—I always said it was too good to last."

It Happened in Boston.—Simpson gallantly escorted his Boston hostess to the table.

"May I," he asked, "sit on your right hand?"

"No," she replied, "I have to eat with it. You'd better take a chair."

A Home Necessity.—A man took his wife to a doctor, who put a thermometer into her mouth and told her to keep her mouth shut for two or three minutes. When departing the man tapped the doctor on the shoulder and said:

"Doctor, what will you take for that thing?"

Costly Immersion.—The mayor of a border town was about to engage a preacher for the new church.

"Parson, you aren't by any chance a Baptist, are you?"

"Why, no, not necessarily. Why?"

"Well, I was just agoin' to say we have to haul our water twelve miles."

Time's Changes.—Mr. Goodleigh—Her age really surprised me; she doesn't look twenty-eight, does she?

Miss Snappe—Not now, but I suppose she did once.—Candle.

Don't Consider the Source.—"Scientists are now generally agreed that drunkenness is a disease, and that the man who drinks should be treated by a physician."

"Oh, well, most men who drink don't care who treats them."

Our Terms.—A correspondent of the New York Tribune suggests that one member of the German Embassy be permitted to remain in the United States, on these conditions: (a) that he paint himself with red and white stripes; and (b) that he be illuminated every evening.

No Wonder He Ran.—We read of Joseph, and his virtue praise, When in King Pharaoh's court he spent his days, Because a woman's wiles he once resisted— Yes, turned and ran when she audaciously insisted.

But note the fact! that painted old Egyptian creature Was hideous enough to frighten any preacher.

Rather than be entranced by such a fright,

What man who would not take incontinent to flight.

And have his name inscribed on history's pages As the most virtuous of all the ages? But had this temptress been a maiden fair,

With glowing cheeks and waving hair,

And lips just like the ripening peach That hangs so temptingly beyond your reach,

And eyes that lure and sparkle bright, Like lustrous stars upon a winter's night,

And bosom heaving warm with love, And voice as cooing as the gentle dove,

And Joseph there should chance to greet her,

He might have run, oh, yes—to meet her.

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

In view of the demonstrations by East Side residents of New York against the high cost of food, an investigation was made by Health Commissioner Haven Emerson, who reports that "there is obviously less dependency and real need than has been common for many years past." This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

THE TYRANNY OF SHAMS.

Something About the Author of the Book with That Title and Many Others.

BY MARSHALL J. GAUVIN.

In his address of Sunday, February 11, before the Rationalist Society of Pittsburgh, Pa., for which he is the lecturer, Mr. Gauvin devoted an hour to an advance introduction of Joseph McCabe of England, who was shortly to lecture for the Society, and to a review of his career and the many books with which he has enriched the literature of Rationalism. Mr. Gauvin spoke as follows.

IGATHER from his writings that Joseph McCabe is of English and Irish extraction, and that he was born in or near the city of Manchester about fifty years ago. In the ardent flush of youth, at the age of sixteen, his studious habits, his contemplative turn of mind, and his decided moral tendencies determined him to join the religious order of St. Francis; and, donning the costume of that fraternity, he entered the Franciscan cloister at Manchester. For a short time—and but for a short time—all went well. In the quiet atmosphere of the cloister his imagination painted scenes of heaven's glory, and fed itself with the fond dream that the ascetic lives of St. Francis, St. Paul and Christ marked the supremacy of excellence that ought to be emulated by all men. But soon—very soon—came a change. The cherished ideal, unable to pass unchallenged, began to be buffeted by strange misgivings. The forces of doubt began to charge the citadel of faith, and the young monk found himself now buoyed with hope, now depressed with skepticism, now satisfied that his course was sound, now painfully bent to believe that he was sacrificing his life to a vision that had no reality outside his imagination. Consulting his novice-master, he was advised to crush the adverse thoughts that arose in his mind, and to avoid everything that might unsettle his belief. That was not exactly the best advice to give to a questioning mind, but the only advice that can be given where falsehood must be shielded from the light of truth.

Upon this cheerless advice McCabe acted, until, a few years later, he entered upon the study of philosophy, or rather the contradictory and emasculated verbiage that passes for philosophy in the curriculum of Rome. With characteristic thoroughness he now waded through the whole vast range of the apologetic literature of the church, in eager search of that truth which might banish from his mind his haunting doubts. While conducting this exhaustive study he was fortunate in being guided for seven years by one of the ablest philosophical teachers of the church, a man who, as general of the whole Franciscan order, subsequently became consultor to the Holy Office at Rome. To this man he confessed week after week his difficulties and desires, and from him received the evasive answers, the groundless assertions, and the misrepresentations of science, of history, and of the views of opponents, with which Catholicism endeavors to still the spirit of inquiring minds. During these years it was McCabe's ambition to become an apologist for the creed of Rome—to write learned defenses of the religion the proofs of the truth of which he was ceaselessly toiling to find. For a time these efforts were rewarded with sufficient assurance of the correctness of his position to satisfy him with the life he had adopted, and, thus encouraged, he pressed on to the goal for which he had set out—to become a preacher and teacher of Christianity. Still, this security was more apparent than real, and from time to time his doubts returned to perplex his mind and sadden his life to such a degree that his obvious unhappiness was observed by his friends. "After five years' study at London he was ordained a priest and appointed to the chair of philosophy." This appointment brought him wider opportunities to pursue his investigations, and of these opportunities he took assiduous advantage. Later he passed a year at the University of Louvain—the Louvain that is no more—where he took a course in fundamental philosophy, and an introductory course in biblical criticism under eminent professors.

It is dangerous for superstition to trench upon the province of critical thought, and these deeper studies of McCabe, instead of strengthening his assurance against the recurrent periods of skepticism from which he still suffered, prepared his mind for an adverse pronouncement upon the fundamentals of the faith. McCabe now saw that the whole contention of the Church of Rome against Protestantism was logically involved in the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope; and that the divine character of Christianity, resting as it does upon the divinity of Christ, is involved in the question of the authenticity and reliability of the gospels. To these cardinal points of the faith he added two others of still more fundamental importance upon which his mind had for a long time brooded with deep concern—the existence of God, and spirituality of the soul. Upon these points he now concentrated all the energies of his mind. The lesser of these doctrines, as he saw, logically depended upon the major premise of all supernatural religion—the existence of God. Unable to prove that God exists by an appeal to the facts of nature, the church insists that we must believe in deity on the authority of faith. To McCabe, thoroughly schooled in philosophy, this argument proved valueless, since faith, which is the acceptance of a doctrine on divine authority, necessarily presupposes a knowledge of God on whom that faith is based, and this knowledge of God can be acquired, if acquired at all, only by rational and therefore verifiable methods. In other words, faith in God comes after a knowledge of God, and until we know that God exists, rational faith in him is out of the question. The position held by Cardinal Newman and others, that the reality of God is proved by the character of the human conscience, McCabe could not accept as tenable, since the facts of psychology demonstrate that conscience is a purely naturalistic quality of mind. Nor could he conceive of a God who, as an external lawgiver, commanded the movements of the material universe. It is unthinkable that matter should be obedient to external commands. On the contrary, the notion that God is the potent principle resident within matter destroys the personality of the Deity and gives us not Theism but Pantheism. Thus, after having subjected every argument for the existence of God to the test of the most logical scrutiny, McCabe emerged from the maze of fruitless theological speculations into the clear light of Agnosticism.

The doctrine of the spirituality of the soul was given up when it was seen that man, as a child of evolution, risen to his present development through millions of years of unfoldment from creatures of lower form, possesses no principle of mind for which a spiritual origin must be assigned.

As for the gospel story, McCabe found the evidence upon which it rests wholly insufficient to prove its truth. He found the age in which Christ is said to have lived utterly silent as to his life and work. He found that the gospels in which his story is told were written by unknown men, in unknown places, a century or more after the events they pretend to describe; that these gospels were selected from a large number of similar writings and called inspired, while the others were rejected as apocryphal; and that the story of the Christ, as told in these gospels, had been enacted in heathen countries many ages before the Galilean peasant was born. He found, too, that the circumstances of the Roman empire at the time of the rise of Christianity were especially propitious to its spread. Thus while the divine figure of Christ dissolved in the light of history, the progress of the Christian movement could be easily accounted for on the ground of historical evolution wholly independently of the reputed agency of miracle.

Taking the gospel story as it stands, McCabe found in it nothing whatever to justify the proud pretensions of the hierarchy of Rome. He came to see, rather, that that great system of ecclesiastical tyranny is a burlesque and a mockery of the supposed teachings of the Nazarene; that its history has been marked throughout, not by meekness and mercy, but by ambition, intrigue, usurpation and vice; that the lives of many of the popes have been flagitiously corrupt; that having obtained their holy office by fraudulent and sometimes murderous means, they have extended its power by methods often as cruel as they were infamous; that the church which poses as tolerant where she is weak, is relentless in her enmities where she has unhampered sway; that she still defends the Inquisition on principles that would lead her to persecute to the death tomorrow if she could once more gain command of the world; and that so far is her leader from the infallible heavenly guidance claimed for him that in this enlightened age she is still the avowed, boastful, and energetic enemy of truth, and of intellectual liberty—the most priceless form of human freedom.

Having arrived at these conclusions after many years of laborious study, McCabe saw that his place was no longer in the Catholic church. He had spent twelve years in monasteries; he was a scholarly and highly respected priest; as the Very Rev. Father Antony, of the order of St. Francis, he held the position of rector of St. Bernardine's College, at Buckingham; he knew the malice of the church towards those who abandon her fold. He might therefore have remained within the church, enjoyed the quiet of the priestly life, kept his friends—and lost his self-respect. This he refused to do. As it was the sincerest moral motives that led him into the church, it was the same motives rectified by the light of truth that persuaded him to abandon her. The church had given him an education; he gave her in return an example of unsullied manhood. And so, in 1896, he laid aside his clerical robes forever, left all titles and dignities behind him, and made his bow to the world as a Rationalist. But for this act he paid the penalty. In an earlier age he would have been burned alive, but at the dawn of the twentieth century, when the world was in the aurora of a new regime, slander and ostracism were the only weapons left in the enfeebled clutch of Rome. Branded as a criminal by a revengeful church for having been true to himself and to mankind, his dearest friends shunned him as though he had been a victim of a frightful plague, and those who were not content merely to draw their skirts about them and flee his presence, reviled him with the bitterest reproaches as they went. 'Twas ever thus, but with the march of time the potency of this ignorant rage grows less and less; and this fact adds its quota to the larger hope of the world.

In Joseph McCabe's advance from Rome to Rationalism the church lost, though she could not know it at the time, one of the brightest ornaments within her mighty fold, and by the same token Freethought may well be proud that such a valiant soldier entered its ranks to battle with supreme skill in the noble cause of mankind. I have said that McCabe is one of the greatest scholars living, and it will be well for me to dwell for a brief while upon his amazing achievements as a writer—upon the wondrous work he has accomplished for the education of the world. His equipment as a scholar is perhaps as broad as that of any other man of this age. More than thirty years of assiduous study of science, philosophy and history has placed the vast story of the life and achievements of humanity at his finger tips. In the fifty volumes or more which he has written and translated in the last twenty years, he reveals a wealth of detailed knowledge drawn from every department of human thought and effort which is altogether amazing. Empires and nations, religions and philosophies, moral ideas and superstitions, manners and customs, the growth of worlds and the decay of hierarchies, the primitive beginnings of human things and judicious suggestions for the improvement of our social life—these things and many more pass the reader's eyes in grand review in the pages of this master scholar and writer of our time.

But I was to speak on the Tyranny of Shams. Therefore on that subject a few words. "The Tyranny of Shams" is one of McCabe's latest books. It is a philosophical criticism of modern society—an exposé of the follies we cherish, and under whose oppressive weight we stagger and suffer. The chief of these follies is the military sham. War has had its place in the world, and has rendered its service to mankind. In the days when civilized states were surrounded by barbaric hordes, when the accumulations of ages of toil and culture were at the mercy of uncouth forces bent on conquest, plunder, and destruction, the army was the protector of liberty and life. Nor alone has war protected civilization from ruin at the hands of its foes: it has been the means of carrying civilization to barbaric lands, and of supplanting primitive wretchedness with a higher state of being. But these things belong to the old days and not to our time. In our day the nations of the world are civilized. The arts, the sciences, education, commerce, they possess in common. Their students know—or should know—the laws of political economy well enough to know that all the means by which human interests are enhanced among civilized nations dwindle and weaken in war, but flourish and grow strong under the ægis of peace.

Every civilized nation contends that it maintains an army not for aggressive but for protective purposes, and in times of war every nation involved seeks to lay the blame at the door of the enemy. While protesting peaceful intentions, nations arm with every ounce of their strength. The hunger for land, the ambition to rule, bad feelings fomented in the breasts of those foiled by secret diplomacy, fears of a neighboring nation insinuated into the popular mind by the malign influence of yellow journals—these and other such factors beget wars. Into the hands of these childish ambitions, these petty jealousies, these sneaking hypocrisies, the people's will is molded by their rulers, and men are murdered and women are widowed not because the war had to be fought in defense of a great principle of humanity, but because the issue was forced by falsehood and unreason that would not stop at murder—because, in a word, the nations are governed by a military sham. "But," say the militarists, "militarism develops character. It brings out the great qualities of courage, endurance, and progressiveness." If by this claim it be meant that militarism fattens the lamb for the slaughter, the contention is just enough. But never was there a greater fallacy, a more hollow sham, than the doctrine that war, which is the object of militarism, enhances the value of men to themselves or to their fellows. The past is the grave of dead nations, and while it is true that war helped those nations into life, it is also true that war, continued as a business, like a monstrous cancer drained the vitality from their veins, and ushered them to the tomb.

Follow the trail of the present war—that awful trail of ashes and of blood; see the finest sons of a dozen nations in their fresh-made graves; see the teachers, the writers, the inventors, the scientists, the artists—the builders of mind and the creators of wealth—whose hearts have been stilled on the field of death; see the myriads that have been crippled and deformed by wounds, and ruined by disease, who will become the fathers of the succeeding generation; behold the sacrifices that have been and are being made by nations that are wearing themselves to the bone of poverty; behold a world whose body is torn and mangled and whose mind is filled with hate; think of a victory in which the nothing gained is purchased at the price of self-annihilation; consider well what France, England, Germany, Austria, Italy and Russia were, and what these nations will be when the roar of battle shall have died away, and then, in the soberness of your senses, ask yourself what good this war has brought the world. Militarism is a sham, war is a crime, and those who willingly submit to either are mental slaves! Let us arbitrate our disputes; let us as a family of nations disband our national armies; and let us retain an international army to serve as a police force to prevent any nation from arming, and to compel her to keep the peace.

Another sham upon which McCabe discourses, is the sham of narrow patriotism, not the patriotism which is the natural love of one's home land, but the patriotism which clings to primitive institutions which are constant impediments and sources of danger to humanity. According to McCabe, it is our sham patriotism that makes us cling to the different languages of the different countries, and to the different weights and measures, and rules and regulations that obtain beyond each set of national boundaries. These differences, he argues, are hindrances to mutual understanding in our international family life, and, consequently, barriers in the way of permanent peace. He believes the time has come when an international language should be spoken by civilized men—when Tokyo and New York, Sydney and Berlin, should use a common speech; when a mile should be of equal length in all countries and on the sea, and when the same kind of money should be used in every land. Certainly such an internationalism would add to the friendship of nations.

Then there are political shams. Kings, emperors and czars, men who, in an age that should be democratic, speak of "my army," "my navy," "my law," "my people"; men who cherish hatreds and await opportunities for revenge, are but political shams. There is no parliament in the world that represents the real interests of the people, who, for the most part, blindly elect its members. Parliaments are largely debating societies where men of wealth and influence toy with language and tinker at legislative schemes, while the people are forgotten or ignored, if not used as pawns to further private ends. The people, who do not want war, are driven into battle by political schemers, because politics, instead of being honest and democratic, is largely a tyrannical sham.

The unequal distribution of wealth is another glaring sham from which millions suffer. We allow a few men to hold vast areas of land for which they can have no possible need, while men who toil to feed and clothe the world have not an inch of ground on which to build a home. We allow the wealth produced by labor to be grasped by the few, while those from whose efforts that wealth was born live in slums, and in times of distress go hungry and suffer from the cold. This is because our means of life are not organized; because our industrial rule is not "cooperation" but "catch as catch can"; because, instead of controlling our lives intelligently, we suffer to continue an economic robbery which is a tyrannous sham.

And there are shams connected with the marriage question. As a people—I speak of the civilized world—and you may write a question mark after the word civilized if you will—we have not yet learned that marriage is a civil contract and a means to an end, and that that end is happiness for the man and for the woman. So comprehended, marriage should lose its binding force when one or the other ceases to be happy in it, else it becomes an instrument not of happiness but of tyranny. Therefore the means of divorce should be within the easy reach of any couple who have finally determined that their union is no longer tolerable. But so far is this from obtaining that a monk, an elderly bachelor in the Vatican at Rome, tells every Catholic woman in the world that though her husband break her ribs, and blacken her eyes, and spend his last dollar in drink, she must live with him; and if she leave him she shall not love another man and try again to be happy. And in Protestant lands, where divorce is allowed, it is sometimes to be had only at a prohibitive price in money, or at the cost of a tale of woe, and sometimes of falsehood, told in court, which many people refuse to tell. What is the secret here? The tyranny of another sham.

In our educational system there are numerous shams. Children are taught many things that are of no possible value. History which teaches the names of kings and the dates of battles; geography which teaches far-fetched facts that will only be forgotten; grammar which consists of a parroting of rules to the neglect of proper practice in speaking and writing—these things and many others are shams in our schools. Children should be taught general principles rather than particular details. History should be made an interesting story with as few names and dates as possible. Grammar should be taught in verbal lessons that impress the mind, rather than by the repetition of rules that memory abhors. Important facts about other countries should be substituted for details about our own. Bible readings about the Patriarchs, or the doings of the Children of Israel, should give place to simple lessons from science as to the formation of the world, and the story of its diversity of life; and above all, the great lesson of international brotherhood should be taught in every school.

And then there is the clerical sham. Men with long faces, standing in pulpits and preaching in a solemn falsetto voice, that a tribal God had personal dealings with men; that the literature of a primitive people is that God's infallible word; that that God became a man and died to save us from his own wrath; and that if we do not believe this we shall all be damned. This barbaric preaching goes on in gilded churches every Sunday of every year, in spite of the fact that it is now known to be false from A to Z. Thus in another department the lives of millions are dominated by a sham. These shams and others Joseph McCabe discusses at length with fullness of knowledge and deep philosophic penetration in a carefully written work of some three hundred pages.

Will these shams last forever? Will man forever be a slave to things that oppress, degrade, and destroy him? Notwithstanding the lamentable conditions of the world, the wars and the rumors of war, the insolence of tyranny, the oppressiveness of laws, the prevalence of poverty, the widespread misery of humanity due to the influence of a thousand causes, we may yet hope for vastly better things. For the world is awakening, and a better day is dawning. Slowly but surely despotism is handing the sceptre to democracy, war is preparing to give place to peace, exploitation is melting into justice, falsehood is yielding to truth, supernaturalism is fading into humanity—man is coming into his own.

New York's "Infidel Missions."

The New York city Freethought street meetings seem to have aroused the church people. This is a sign of the value of the meetings, as the tactics of the church have been to ignore all Rationalist activity as long as they could. When they are obliged to say something it means that they have felt the sting. It seems that a Mr. John N. Wolf, superintendent of the Beacon Light Gospel Hall, has furnished some information concerning these meetings for the Missionary Review of the World. Like all Christian sources of information, Mr. Wolf is not always accurate, yet what he says is of interest. He speaks of "several Infidel organizations in New York city, known by various titles that do not indicate their real character." He then tells of their outdoor meetings "in all the principal thoroughfares at noon and at night," where Jesus Christ is held up to ridicule, and many blasphemies are uttered. "If they are so bold in their 'ridicule' and 'blasphemies' in the open air 'in all the principal thoroughfares,' Mr. Wolf might be kind enough to explain how this coincides with his other statement about the organizations 'known by various titles that do not indicate their real character.'"

Another thing that disturbs Mr. Wolf and the Review is the "distribution of Infidel literature." "books and pamphlets written by Tom Paine, Robert G. Ingersoll, Voltaire and others." Here he, like most Christians, knows of no prominent Infidels except these three he mentions. If he wishes to enlarge his vocabulary of prominent Infidels, I would be pleased to furnish him the names of about two hundred more, in all walks of life; the works of some of them being sold at the meetings which are causing Christians so much solicitude. He also speaks of the street speakers selling a "monthly magazine," for "the purpose of 'educating the public and freeing them from the bondage of religion.'" Of course, it would not do for Mr. Wolf to tell his readers that this "monthly magazine" is THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that it is published weekly. He might then be the means of someone's hunting it up on the first occasion and buying a copy. He prefers to do as Comstock did in his "Frauds Exposed"—attack this journal without mentioning its name.

"A third form of this satanic activity is the debate, held sometimes in public squares and sometimes in halls. . . . These debates are often carried on by educated and able men, who display considerable familiarity with the subjects. The enemy of God has able generals." Is the cause of God so weak that it has failed to attract to itself "able generals"? Judging from some of these debates that I have heard, I think this is the trouble.

"Another method employed to spread Infidelity is the establishment of 'Sunday schools.'" We are glad also to hear that there are Sunday schools in the Metropolis, where children are taught facts instead of the fables, follies and falsehoods of Christianity.

Mr. Wolf speaks of the "young men, who make up most of the audiences." Well, it is refreshing to learn that the young men are buying books, reading and thinking for themselves instead of spending their time in the saloons and the churches. This is not a good omen for either the church or the saloon.

Mr. Wolf ends by saying: "This aggressive Infidelity and Agnosticism are a challenge to the Christian church to proclaim the gospel by word and deed to the unchurched and unsaved multitudes of men, women and children in our cities. . . . Many pastors and laymen are recognizing the opportunity offered by the street meeting to reach the masses.

. . . If the average Christian layman were only half as energetic and enthusiastic in witnessing to his faith as the average 'Freethinker' is in voicing his unbelief, the activities of organized Infidelity in New York city would be met by such a wave of aggressive evangelism as has not been known since apostolic days." Has not the Christian church been proclaiming the gospel "by word and deed" for nearly nineteen hundred years." Unfortunately, the "word and deed" have been the cause of its condemnation by the great majority of reading, thinking people of the twentieth century.

Wherever Freethinkers have held street meetings they have invariably compelled the church to do the same. I have many times seen the two side by side, with the Freethought meeting having a large audience going up into the hundreds and the religious meeting having a "corporal's guard," even though the latter was reinforced by an organ and a choir. Come along with your street meetings, Brother Wolf.

In the "wave of evangelism," "not known since the apostolic days," we shall want to see five thousand people fed with five loaves and two fishes, with "the fragments that remain" filling twelve baskets. We may see "fear come upon every soul" and five thousand converted on hearing one sermon; but we are more likely to see that it takes five thousand sermons to convert one person. When the church arrives at the happy time when it realizes that the people do not want "evangelism" but do want sense, there might be some hope for its life.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

God and My Neighbors.

Professor Felix tells his pupils, "I should hate to believe that when I die that will be the end of me."

It seems to be a fixed principle among Christians, from the Perfect Hypocrite down to Professor Felix, that what one longs to believe true must be so. Yet should that principle be carried into the courts (as I fear it sometimes is), and judges and juries should go by preference instead of by evidence, the administration of justice would be destroyed.

By advocating such a principle, people undermine the foundations of public morality. Justice and wisdom require that one should decide according to the evidence, and if the decision is not to his liking, accept it nevertheless, and make the best of the situation.

A Freethinking gentleman of my acquaintance, a member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, regrets that he is so bound by certain conditions that he can say and do but little openly for the cause of liberty.

His business is one that makes him quite dependent on the favor of the public. He has a family of whom he is very proud and very fond. These are of course dependent upon him. And at home he has three generations of sensitive Christian women to keep in good humor.

But I understand that sometimes, when he gets too much stirred up, he opens his mouth and makes remarks.

He tells me that he has been an unbeliever ever since his youth, was made so by reading the Bible when a boy of about eighteen years.

Not long ago he accompanied his wife to a watch meeting. Here the final exercise was that the devout knelt down in a circle, hand in hand, and sang "God will take care of you."

To my friend this was quite a joke, for he knows that none of the singers depends on "God" to take care of him and that one who really should try to do so would be likely to be sent to the mad-house.

According to the newspaper, a bill designed to destroy the trade in corsets has been prepared by an Indianapolis lady, Mrs. Anna Hoeltke, and will soon be brought before the legislature by Representative-elect Wm. S. Woods.

Mrs. Hoeltke is reported as having said in an interview:

"The corset has killed more women and children than whisky, tobacco, war and famine. This worse than barbarous custom of deforming the waists of girls and women is far more injurious than the savage custom of flattening the head or the Chinese custom of binding feet.

"Reports indicate that thousands of deformed babies are born every year as the result of mothers binding their waists with corsets. The government has passed laws prohibiting the sale of habit-forming drugs. What is the government going to do to prevent the coming generation from living in a whalebone prison before birth?"

It would seem that the women might give the men a rest while they investigate a few matters such as corsets, shoe heels, exposed chests; but they will not be likely to do so, and Mrs. Hoeltke's plan to use the arm of the law to rob them of their darling waist-constrictors is like that of the woman who fancied she could wipe up the ocean with her mop.

The story looks to me like a joke on the prohis.

Timothy has been apologizing for some of "God's" mysterious dispensations. He says that there is often a good purpose wrought out by what seems hardship, and illustrates thus:

"You know that this has been a hard summer for farmers. Early in the season there was too much rain, and crops were damaged or destroyed. Later came drouth to prevent the farmer from succeeding with later crops. But men are so greedy and grasping that it is well for them to have losses to teach them to depend upon a Higher Power. For example, a man had a fine forty-acre field of wheat just ready for harvest when a heavy rain caused a near-by stream to overflow and ruin the wheat. Probably this loss was good for the owner to keep him chastened and humble."

But Timothy's deity (granting that it is he that cuts up these capers with the weather to punish some person or persons for too much greed) seems to hit the wrong person. It is the poor that suffer most, the poor farmers who cannot afford to lose a crop, and the poor of this and other lands who need plenty of good wheat to make them bread and cheap and abundant corn to make them meat. The ones that suffer most are they who expect nothing but a bare living and are content if they get even that.

According to the Book, Jehovah did some queer jobs of punishing. To punish David for the debauchery of Bathsheba and the murder of Uriah, Jehovah slew an innocent child. David tried to bluff the god by a pretense of great sorrow, but had a quick recovery when he saw that his bluff had not worked. Also Jehovah "punished" David by causing Absalom to make his father trouble, but it was the young prince that got the worst of it.

But a stranger case of punishing was that of Jehovah's slaying seventy thousand of the king's unoffending subjects after David had caused a census to be taken. This is incomprehensible to our modern ideas, which are very different from the ancient one that the subject is the property of the king.

However, as the mountain woman said to the missionary when he told her the story of the cross, "Let us hope it ain't so."

Orson tells me that before his marriage he did some bad things, but since that time he has been good.

He was a farm laborer, a ruddy-cheeked rustic beau, who delighted after his day's work was done to clean up and go "a-courtin'." But after various courtships he married Netty, a rather plain young woman who had a little money.

A few months after the wedding came the first baby. Since then others have come about as fast and as regularly as the angels could get around with them. The young couple bought a farm with Netty's money, but, mayhap because they have had so many babies, were compelled later to sell it. Then, with what they could save out of the sale of the farm, they bought a smaller place, going into debt on that.

However, Orson is perfectly good ever since his marriage. What it was bad that he did before that event, I have never learned. I have never heard of his having damaged any woman (with the possible exception of his wife), and he couldn't have injured himself to any appreciable degree, for his health is magnificent. But, they say that Netty's health is somewhat broken.

The Reverend Ezra is about to read to his congregation the bee-you-ti-ful story of Ruth, and pauses to speak a word of admonition. He wishes to warn the young against reading love stories, "silly, sickening love stories," and he puts on a look as though he is about to "throw up." "Put here, my young friends," and his face shines oilily, his lips drip honey, as lovingly he strokes the Book, "you will find in plenty love stories, the purest, the noblest, the most elevating." That of the love of Absalom for Tamar, perhaps.

Ezra used to say, "The man that takes time and pains to learn something he can never use is a fool."

Judging from his talks to the Reubs on the subject of evolution, he never erred in learning too much.

Jim used to read fiction, but he got religion and quit that evil practice. Now he reads the Bible and "God's Revivalist."

God seems to be reckless with his own property. Here goes another church.

"Rockport, Ind., Jan. 3, 1917.—St. Bernard Catholic church at Rockport was destroyed by fire, the fire originating from a Christmas tree which one of the sisters was lighting. The loss is $20,000."

Mrs. Schmidt is proud of the parochial girls' school. Says she, "It is a fine school. Several of the young lady grajates have been permitted to the bar."

Who remembers the little boy who went fishing on Sunday and was drowned?

A devout lady attended the midnight mass. She went home, ate a lunch of crackers and canned salmon, remained up, and attended the five o'clock mass. Later she was taken violently ill and died within a few hours.
